Pub Prices Go up

by Chris Hall

Drink prices at the Underground were raised at the beginning of this week. The AMS Board of Directors instituted the increases in order to cover the rising operating costs of pubs at Queen's.

Sheila Murray, Queen's Student Agency Director and an ex-officio member of the Board of Directors, told the Journal, "There hasn't been a price increase in three years and since that time our costs have increased significantly. Costs of liquor and beer increased in Ontario and bartenders' wages at the Pub were increased last year."

Prices were increased 5c, 10c, and 15c straight across the board. Drinks such as the House Special which do low-volume sales were increased only a nickel as they were, "already overpriced and we felt that any major increase would only decrease volume sales," said Murray.

She added, "Beer and draft were very underpriced and as such were both increased a dime. This is more than fair since we are adding a more expensive beer, Brador, at the same price as other beers and we will therefore be selling them at a loss."

Eric Cameron, the manager of the Underground, said, "People don't like the increases but we've tried to give some benefit within the price structure."

"Draft is still the cheapest by ounce in Kingston. Tequila was also reclassified and has, in effect, been reduced in price. Screwdrivers used to be $1.10 per ounce of vodka and now they are 90c per ounce. Although orange juice costs more than other mixes, the cost isn't much such that we can't bear it."

The Underground has also added a new line of non-alcoholic drinks. The drinks, called the Unebriates, were added to accommodate those students who are non-drinkers but who still go to the pub for the entertainment and dancing, and to be with fellow students and friends.

"We are trying to make the pub a place for everybody and not just a place for drinkers," said Murray. "The drinks will be priced at cost to the pub."

"People here aren't price-conscious," said Cameron. "We feel they will still consistently buy the same drinks in the same quantity at the increased price."

As people lined up in front of the gym before finals, these two were spotted basking in the sun. So much for the academic spirit!

Enrolment for spring up, summer may decline

by Tim Greenwood

Pending final figures, intercession enrollment this year appears to be up ten percent from last year.

Ross Wardle, Director of Extension and Summer School, said this increase was slightly greater than expected and represents nearly 1300 students attending classes on Campus. However enrollment in summer term is significantly lower than last year he noted. (The population figures are based on the number of course registrations and since students occasionally enroll in two courses the figures could be slightly off.)

Wardle attributes intercession's growing popularity to the increase in the number, variety, and quality of the courses offered as well as to the fact students are now better informed about intercession.

The range of courses offered is decidedly limited by the six week term Wardle said and he sees the relatively recent introduction of Spring-Summer evening courses as a way of increasing the variety of courses run during the summer months. The evening courses last twelve weeks and the longer term allows for the introduction of more demanding courses. "The evening classes make it more accessible to a broader range of students," he said.

Wardle cited several reasons for students attending spring and summer term: shortening the number of years required to finish a degree, changing a program, or just out of interest. He noted that by offering key courses in honour programs, students could pick up a course "like Psych 100" and change their program without losing a year. However he emphasized intercession is not meant to be "supplemental or makeup" and consequently students who have failed a course during the year are not permitted to take that course during the spring or summer terms.

While in several Ontario universities there has been a slight decline in fall-winter enrollment and an increase in the number of part-time students, Wardle observed this pattern does not follow at Queen's; here regular enrollment remains steady while there has not been a significant increase in part-time enrollment. Part-time enrollment across the province has not increased as much as was predicted he said.

He observed however that at many universities students are picking up part-time jobs to help pay for school and some subsequently lighten their course load. In the past, due to stricter regulations and prevailing attitudes this path was more difficult to follow he observed, and students tended to proceed through high school and university in a "lock-step fashion".

Sixty percent of the intercession population are students who have been full-time in the fall and winter while about forty percent are "traditional part-time students" Wardle stated. About five percent of the intercession students are on letters of permission from other universities and there is a very small number of graduate students he added. He felt it was interesting to note that of the 381 new students this year (versus 293 last year) half have a university degree or have credits toward a degree.

Henry retires

by Terry Wright

Henry and Elsie Rosenbalm, faithful employees of Queen's for close to twenty years, are leaving Kingston to retire in Germany in a home built for them by a nephew. A farewell party attended by family and friends was held for the couple last Friday night at Victoria Hall.

On top of being building supervisor for the women's residences, Henry Rosenbalm was on call twenty-four hours a day, seven days a week at Vic Hall where he lived. Henry will be remembered for his sense of humour, his "big heart" and his ever present helping hand. Elsie Rosenbalm was the cook for the Victoria Hall infirmary, and was praised at the party for her warmth in caring for the sick.

No computer program

OSAP aid late

by Colin d'Eca

The OFS has learned from a reliable source within the Ministry of Colleges and Universities that the new student aid programme is not yet ready to go on stream and that the grant cheques are likely to be at least a month late if not longer.

The new programme which has come in for severe criticism from the OFS will exclude at least 10,000 students from aid (MCU figures).

The computer programme for the administration of the new scheme is not yet completed and is not expected to go on stream until July. Mr. Clarkson the programme coordinator told the OFS executive in a meeting last January that if the programme was not in the computer by April then the cheques would be as late as in 1976.

The complete manual on how to administer the new programme is not available to awards officers as of yet, in particular key chapters such as chapter 5 which deals with how to assess students, have not yet been prepared and printed. In other cases the manual does not coincide with the booklet published by the ministry outlining the new aid scheme.

Plotting the contribution curves from the published booklet gives a crenated curve with higher income levels; there are numerous other bugs in the system which have to be ironed out.

All in all it appears that the new aid scheme is administratively unfeasible, that it will take several months to iron out all the problems in the programme, and that students can expect to wait until the end of October to mid November for their grant cheques.

Communications Authority, will receive an honorary doctor of laws degree Friday, May 26 at afternoon ceremonies. He will address students graduating from Queen's Theological College, the faculty of education and the school of graduate studies and research.

The following day, Saturday, May 27, honorary doctor of science degrees will be presented at the morning session to Elsie G. MacGill, a consulting aeronautics engineer, and to John W. Beaver, special adviser to both the minister of Indian and Northern Affairs, and the president of the National Indian Brotherhood. Mr. Beaver will speak to graduates of the faculty of applied science and the school of business.

In the afternoon ceremonies students from law, nursing, medicine and rehabilitation therapy will be addressed by R. Gordon L. Fairweather, chief commissioner of the Canadian Human Rights Commission, whom the university will honor with a doctor of laws degree.

Betty Oliphant, principal and director of the National Ballet School, will be recipient of an honorary doctor of laws degree Saturday, June 3 during morning ceremonies. She will address graduates of the faculty of arts and science.

In the final afternoon session Dr. Henry E. Duckworth, president of the University of Winnipeg, will accept an honorary doctor of science degree and speak to arts and science graduates.

Principal Ronald L. Watts announced the six recipients Thursday, April 27 at a regular meeting of the university Senate.

All five sessions of convocation will be held in Jock Hartly Arena on Union Street. Sessions begin at 10 a.m. and 2:30 p.m.

Queen's honors six oldtimers

Staff

Queen's University saluted six staff members on Tuesday, April 25, who this year have completed either 25 or 40 years of service to the University.

At a dinner held in the Faculty Club, Principal Ronald L. Watts paid special tribute to Emeritus Professor Jake F. Edwards who retired this past fall from the school of physical and health education, and to Jean K. McBratney, an administrative assistant in the office of the dean of medicine, for 40 years of dedicated work at Queen's.

Those honoured for 25 years of service include: Dr. James R. Allen, professor of physics; W.J. (Bill) Guidue, stationary engineer; Harriet Scott, a senior librarian in the geology library; and Dr. Robert E. Semple, professor of physiology.

There are 136 staff members, some of whom have already retired, with 25 or more years of service. The 89 staff members who attended the dinner represent a combined total of 2,800 years of service to the university in various capacities.

Campus Comment

by Chris Hall

Campus Comment went Underground this week to question Queen's students on their reactions to the recent rise in pub prices. Each person was asked whether or not they felt the increase in drink prices was justified, and why.

Ken Davies - Commerce '79 - No, I don't think the price increase is justified. I recognize the fact that liquor prices and beer prices have gone up all through Ontario, and I also recognize that the pub has had its rent increased, but I don't think that the Pub should be a profit-making organisation. I should only break even. Through better management of the Pub, prices can be held down. I've looked at a few monthly statements of the Pub, and there are some ridiculous figures for breakage and spillage. I would also prefer to have lower prices and pay a small cover charge on the nights when a band comes into the Pub.

Sue Douglas-Murray - Arts '80 - Yes, I do. First of all, liquor prices have gone up in Ontario. The government raised all beer and liquor prices so the Pub has to accommodate for that. Secondly, their rent to the University has gone up over 100 percent here in the Underground, they don't share the cost anymore. So, the Pub has to facilitate that cost. Therefore, they have to raise prices. They also have to pay a lot of wages; waitresses' wages, and so on. So, the price raise is justified, particularly since it's only about ten cents extra.

I noticed the price change the other night because I ended up paying three dollars for almost nothing, but I'm not tempted to go anywhere else because it's still the cheapest place to go if you want band entertainment and dancing. I think it's fair that they've jacked them up the amount that they have.

Mark Opzoomer - Commerce '79 - Yes, I think the price raise is justified. I think it's inevitable that prices go up. Look at beer prices in general. They have gone up twice since April 1st, and it is my understanding that the rent and entire cost of operating the pub have gone up. Bartenders wages went up, and let's face it, the price of everything is going up. Even with the price increases though, the Pub is still about the cheapest place in town. It is respectable for the entertainment provided and the quality of the service you get here, and because of these attributes, the price increases are acceptable.

Gary Solway - Commerce '80 - I think they are justified although I don't like them very much. I understand that the rent has gone up here and that beer prices have recently increased in Ontario, so you have to expect those to be passed on to us. I don't think you can beat the prices here, you get entertainment and it's where most of my friends go as well, so it's still the best place as far as I'm concerned.

Emmanuel Fernandez dies in pool

by Tim Greenwood

Emmanuel Fernandez, forty-five, an artist in the Queen's Geology Department, died after suffering a heart attack while swimming in the Queen's pool on Friday April 20. The cause of death was determined after an autopsy performed by Dr. Clifford Meyer the same day. Mr. Fernandez is survived by his wife Thelma who works at the Douglas Library.

This is a summary of events of that day according to pool manager Simon Beitler.

At approximately 1:00 p.m. a lifeguard noticed a man bend over in the shallow end of the pool. He did not react immediately as people often bend over for various reasons such as to practice drown-proofing. A few moments later a passing swimmer noticed the man and pulled him to pool side where two lifeguards attended to him. They laid him on his side on the deck and watched as he vomited thinking that this was perhaps a reaction to swimming too soon after eating. It was for this reason they did not begin AR immediately.

Meanwhile, Dr. Serge Jothy, a pathologist who was swimming lengths noticed the lifeguards standing around Mr. Fernandez and swam over to help. Upon examining Mr. Fernandez he told the lifeguards and Beitler, who was now on the scene, that the man was dying. Jothy performed artificial respiration while Beitler performed heart massage but all efforts to revive Fernandez were unsuccessful.

Beitler coordinated the lifeguards during the incident. He sent one lifeguard to phone an ambulance while he got a water polo player who is also a qualified lifeguard to clear the pool. Beitler felt the four people working with him operated as smoothly and efficiently as possible under the circumstances.

Beitler said the doctor who performed the autopsy told him Fernandez had suffered a small heart attack two hours before he swam in the pool. Beitler believes Fernandez was dead even as he was pulled from the pool.

One eyewitness said the lifeguards appeared "a bit incompetent" in their handling of the incident. She said no whistle was blown to clear people from the pool and she estimated that it took about ten minutes to clear. Another eyewitness felt the lifeguards stood around, unsure how to respond and he was surprised artificial respiration was not begun earlier than it was.

However, the handling of the tragedy by Beitler and the lifeguards was commended by the Sergeant Detective of the Kingston City Police who investigated the incident and by a letter of commendation from the Safety Department at the Queen's Physical Plant.

Job Bank gets working

by Gord Howe

Students looking for work in Kingston this summer are well advised to register with Job Bank, an A.M.S. service operating in the John Deutsch University Centre's central meeting area. After its first week of operation, Job Bank has received 160 job notices of which 135 have already been filled. More than 600 students have registered with this service.

Job Bank solicits full-time, part-time and short-term jobs from the Kingston community and posts these on the notice board in front of their desk in the University Centre. At the same time they will register students and file their registration form according to qualifications and past job experience. In this way they hope to match up the students with the jobs. When a job comes in that requires particular qualifications the directors will call students who meet the requirements and inform them of the job being offered.

But the directors, Dave Court and Marcia Turner, emphasize that most jobs that come in do not require any particular qualifications and that the students on hand are the ones who will get the jobs. According to Court, "If a student wants to get a job, he must come in every day and check the job board." A common mistake that many students make is to assume that registration with the service is all that is needed to get a summer job. Students should be checking continuously with Job Bank to be assured a summer job. Court said: "If someone comes in here in the morning and wants a job, he will have a job by noon."

Another problem noted by the directors is that students are still only considering full-time jobs, although the majority of jobs available are part-time or casual. Rather than sitting around waiting for a full-time position students should consider taking some part-time or casual work.

Turner pointed out, "Many students last summer worked entirely on these types of jobs and made enough money to return to university in the fall." More students ought to consider combining shorter term jobs.

Both directors also emphasize that students seeking employment should visit Job Bank. The service will operate until the middle of August, from 8:30 to 4:30 every Monday to Friday. "Come and see us, we're friendly."

Cancer research funded

Staff

More than $240,000 has been awarded to seven researchers at Queen's University to support their investigations into breast cancer, urinary cancer, cancer detection and treatment.

The Ontario Cancer Treatment and Research Foundation has granted a total of $1.7 million to cancer projects across the province. This year's funding is provided by the provincial government, donations and bequests, and the Provincial Lottery.

The largest Queen's grant, $44,000, goes to Dr. Hugh F. Pross for his research in connection with blood cells in healthy bodies that destroy tumors but fail to attack tumors in patients with cancer. He holds a dual appointment with the Department of Radiation Oncology and the Department of Microbiology and Immunology.

Drs. Charles E. Bird, Ernest Sterns and Ken Taguchi of the Department of Surgery will receive $32,000, $22,000 and $16,500 respectively for

by Colin d'Eca

The major item of business at an OGA executive meeting held in Toronto last Saturday was a response to the proposed attack on foreign students and now potentially to the incomes of all graduate students.

The Federal Department of Employment and Immigration sought to bring in new proposals this April to eliminate the eligibility of foreign graduate students to hold work permits required for them to carry out teaching assistantships and demonstratorships in Canadian universities. Due to opposition from the OGA, OFS, COU (Council of Ontario universities) and AUCC (Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada) the department agreed to delay implementation of such proposals until next year.

However our information is that the plot has thickened. Mainly on the thrust of the MCU (Ontario) and as a response to the lay off of junior faculty because of massive cutbacks in university spending, the DEI is considering a reclassification of teaching assistantships which would make them 'jobs' in the ordinary

This would imply that the positions be openly advertised and that any qualified applicant (not necessarily a graduate student) could be employed, and as far as foreign students are concerned, they would not be able to obtain a TA until the Universities had proved to the satisfaction of the manpower officials that there was no qualified Canadian to fill the post. As TAs as they are presently constituted are low paid and a TA unit may not exceed 10 hours of work including preparation and marking time (although many do take up considerably more time in reality) they would not be very attractive to any one other than a graduate, it seems that the pressure is on the universities to amalgamate TAs into acceptable employable posts, a move which would exclude all graduate students from TAs.

In Ontario with the new OSGP excluding graduates from grant support, a fee increase imminent in the 79-80 session, and the general precarious state of graduate finances, this blow to one of the major sources of graduate student income cannot fail to be yet one further nail in the coffin of Ontario's graduate schools. The exclusion of foreign students will virtually see the end of a foreign presence in the universities of Canada and a consequent decline in the quality and prestige of Canadian higher education.

A letter attacking the MCU's role in this scheme has been sent from the OGA to Dr. Parrott, and the OGA executive will be meeting the Federal opposition parties employment and immigration critics to discuss the situation.

The OGA is also preparing for an all out attack on the arbitrary and capricious use of ACAP (Advisory Committee on Academic Planning) to rationalise what is the destruction of the Ontario Graduate school. At present the psychology departments of Ontario universities are under investigation, plans are under way to obtain copies of the ACAP report to be delivered in July, to organize with the Ontario Psychology Students Associations and with graduates attending the August meeting of the American Psychology Association in Toronto to come out with a plan to oppose any detrimental aspects of the report.

Queen's University law professor Dr. William R. Lederman will receive an honorary degree from Dalhousie University in Halifax.

An honorary doctor of laws degree will be conferred Friday, May 19, at Dalhousie's law convocation. He also holds honorary degrees from the University of Saskatchewan and the University of Victoria.

A native of Regina, Sask., Prof. Lederman 62, graduated from the University of Saskatchewan with a BA in 1937 and LL.B. in 1940. He was chosen a Rhodes Scholar in 1939 for the province but postponed attending Oxford University until after the war.

One of Canada's foremost constitutional lawyers, he is a member of the bar in Ontario, Saskatchewan and Nova Scotia. He served on the Ontario advisory committee on confederation (1965-71), and the committee on university affairs for Ontario (1972-74). He was made Queen's Counsel in 1962 and elected to the Royal Society of Canada in 1972.

A curiously selective opposition

It is interesting to see the effect that the opposition parties in the Ontario Legislature can have when they want to. The recently proposed O.H.I.P. increases provide the perfect example.

Keith Norton, the Minister of Community and Social Services, had proposed a 37 percent increase in O.H.I.P. premiums, as part of the provincial government's cutbacks in the social services sector. The opposition parties reacted strongly to this politically sensitive issue and forced the Tory government to reduce the increases substantially.

The important point to note is that Norton could have instituted these increases without consulting the Legislature, which is what he had originally intended to do. It required no legislation to effect the increases as it was an administrative action only. But the opposition forced the issue onto the floor of the Legislature, where it was debated. The minority Conservative government was forced to back down under the threat of an immediate vote of non-confidence and a subsequent election.

So where is the expressed support for the post-secondary educational system, which is also facing severe cutbacks, cutbacks that have been continuing since 1972?

Since the freeze on capital grants to universities, the altered O.S.A.P. program, and the systematic underfunding of post-secondary institutions began, the opposition parties have stated their concern, but have noted that these cutbacks have been the result of administrative actions on the part of the government; the opposition spokesmen have claimed that therefore they can do little but raise the occasional question in the Legislature. We have just seen that this is clearly not the case.

The post-secondary education system is not a political priority on the scale of the O.H.I.P. increases, and the opposition parties have shown themselves to be readily cognisant of this fact. They are not prepared to threaten the Davis government with an election over the issues facing students, for the hard facts are that they would probably lose credibility for forcing an election on such a low profile issue. Higher education systems are not publicly popular and every politician, by the nature of the beast, must have an eye on the next election.

Nevertheless, it is disturbing to see that the opposition parties are prepared to fight cutbacks selectively, as in the O.H.I.P. case, and allow other important areas to suffer. Universities and colleges are facing financial problems of grave proportions, and possible closures, but the Liberals and the N.D.P. are satisfied with asking only a few questions in the Legislature, and at that only when they know students are watching in the public galleries.

The opposition parties can no longer use the excuse of administrative action by the government to explain their own inaction on the problems facing the post-secondary system, as they have proven it to be false. Universities and colleges are not high political priorities, but they are also not the only area facing cutbacks. Rather than fighting cutbacks selectively, and allowing vital areas in the social service field to be permanently damaged, they should be working to eliminate all cutbacks in the social services sector, and saving government funds from more questionable areas of expenditure.

Structural changes for NUS

by Colin d'Eca

The sixth annual meeting of the National Union of Students is to be held at Memorial University, St. John's, Newfoundland, next week May 9th to 14th.

A major item of business will be the restructuring of the organization in attempts to make it more effective and responsive to student needs. The main proposed change is to introduce full time executive positions. At present the profile of the organization has been presented by the Executive secretary, an employee of the organization and not elected by the student body.

It is planned to phase out the position and replace it with two full time executive positions elected by the students. The rest of the executive would remain as at present as part time, consisting of representatives from the executives of each of the provincial student organizations plus two members elected at large.

Another major change is to move towards the idea of constituency organizations within a federated structure of NUS. This constituency commissions would consist of student groups of common concern for example, graduates, part time students, university undergraduates and community college students; the major attraction of these commissions would be the ability of non-NUS members to be members of the commission and so have input into the overall student movement.

The problem with the plans as presently formulated for the commissions, as far as the Ontario Graduate Association is concerned, is the requirement of a commission member to go to referendum over NUS membership after two years, and failure to win that referendum meaning exclusion from the commission. Whilst there is little objection to be committed to hold a referendum it was considered harsh and against the political advantages of a commission - the strengthening of the student movement by securing a larger base - to exclude members because they failed to win a referendum.

Queen's was particularly disturbed by this plan as it would mean withdrawal from further participation in the National Graduate Commission - which was thought of by Queen's, U of T, and Calgary - as the GSS would have to swing the whole undergraduate population at Queen's in favour of NUS to win any referendum, an unlikely proposition given Queen's no to NUS membership on two occasions.

The OGA is thus moving to delay implementation of any such constitutional arrangement for the NGS, and to hold a national graduate conference concurrent with the October NUS conference at Western. As the OGA is the biggest and strongest graduate group in Canada the trump card is their hands.

Grub-street (grub-strit) 1630 I. Orig. The name of a street near Moorfields in London (now Millicott Street) "much inhabited by writers of small histories, dictionaries, and temporary poems; hence, the tribe of literary hacks."

Harry Truman once said in his 1948 presidential campaign, "Polls are like sleeping pills designed to lull the voters into sleeping on election day. You might call them 'sleeping pills'."

Harry Truman had good reason to distrust the gloomy prophets of doom who predicted the ousting of the fiery president. They wouldn't believe it when Harry had been elected. Recall the classic blunder by the Chicago Tribune the morning after the election, "DEWEY DEFEATS TRUMAN." Somebody at that paper decided to believe the pollsters, printing the paper, and go to bed. Unfortunately for the Tribune, the voters had a different idea.

What we are experiencing in Canada now is poll fever, a disease related to poll rapture, which infested the American media in 1948. Poll fever is a form of paranoia which sends politicians and journalists scurrying to their conference rooms and typewriters to interpret a collection of statistics which, after analysis and interpretation, reflect the thoughts of the public on certain pertinent issues, i.e. federal elections. The mysterious disease has been most recently detected in the offices of the Liberal Party of Canada, and to a lesser extent in a stately home on Sussex Drive. It is communicable and contagious. Beware!

For the past few weeks the sad victims of this most crippling malady have dominated the pages and airwaves of the Canadian media speculating on the prospect of a federal election in June, July, October or perhaps on Christmas Day, though a nasty present from the Canadian electorate would be enough to ruin any Prime Minister's Christmas. (The day has been used effectively before by the Liberals, however, when poll fever has struck.)

A recent Gallup poll and Goldfarb survey have showed a trend away from the Liberal leadership of Pierre Trudeau. Therefore, the election machinery has ground to a halt and the Canadian people are in a state of suspended animation, waiting for Godot ("Is he coming? Oh yes. When is he coming? Oh, perhaps tomorrow, or the next.") while the politicians

fret over a few percentage points.

How reliable are the polls? Often not very reliable at all. They cloud, distort and influence issues as much as they clarify them. Especially election polls. We don't have to go back to 1948 to find examples of the damage of poll fever. In Ontario Peter Regensieff's polls have never failed to produce surprises on election day, especially in 1975 when they predicted everything short of a Liberal majority at Queen's Park. Not many people who believed the pollsters thought John Diefenbaker would ever be Prime Minister of Canada. Rene Levesque would gain a majority in Quebec or, for that matter, Pierre Trudeau would still be in office in 1978.

Yet, they are, and perhaps the old adage is best, "The only real poll is on election day." Public opinion polls simply are too vulnerable to trust, for they combine percentages, error factors and other sophisticated methods to produce the most accurate readout possible of the electoral mood and yet, they are sometimes misleading. Perhaps the whole assumption that one can mathematically measure and predict a person's response is wrong.

It is on the shaky premise of percentage points that the Liberals have destroyed their election momentum and caused great apathy within their ranks, to mention nothing of the way the Canadian people view the whole production. The longer they procrastinate, the more apathetic people become and the more indecisive they appear. Unless there is hard-core evidence that the Liberals would lose an election in the summer and win one in the fall or next spring, which one would be led to feel there isn't, we may be witnessing one of the most colossal blunders ever to blaze the hallowed annals of Canadian politicking. Poll fever may have destroyed whatever chance the Liberals had of retaining their government in a time when many people feel that they should be tossed out on their pompous behinds. Perhaps somebody should take a survey.

Call the election, Pierre. There may still be time, and you can probably salvage most of the momentum your doom-sayers have destroyed. And if a poll the day before the election tells you that you're about to be clobbered, ignore it. If it looks like you're about to win, remember to fear the Greeks, especially when they come bearing gifts.

Musclebound to nowhere

by Terrence Reynolds

Just the other day, I overheard a conversation between two musclebound lads as they ascended from the Weight Room Temple, after having done as many exercises as possible without taking their eyes off the conveniently placed mirrors (this is something to reflect upon). One of them was admiring the tan that the other one possessed, but the second fellow was complaining, saying, "I've got nothing better to do until my Income Tax returns. Then I still have to get my pokey cheque. If it doesn't come soon I'll have to miss a week skiing at Sunshine. Damn the government anyways!"

"You said it buddy," replied the other. Weider's Wonder, "We're always getting shafted by that government. Oh, by the way, I think you could use some more rays around your lats. Here, have some of my Native Tanning Lotion, fortified with riboflavin, niacinamide, iron and Vitamin A. It was on sale for $15 a bottle."

At this point, the conversation changed to a discussion about the crummy facilities in the Phys-Ed centre. "We need more machines down there. It's that rotten Davis character and his cutbacks."

"No dummy," said the golden ape, "the Liberals are in power. It's Trudeau who is to blame. You can bet that my vote goes to Davis in the next federal election. You should try to pay more attention to the outside world."

"Yah, I guess you are right. Let's go downtown for a carrot juice."

"We don't have to go downtown, stupid, the Pub has opened again, thank God. I can't stand drinking with all those low-class local yokels. The atmosphere is much better on campus. Besides, who could I impress downtown if I wore my white Bermuda Snorkle Club tee shirt. The chicks really go for it at the Pub. I wonder which one of them is going to get lucky with me tonight?"

During the entire conversation, the two body beautifuls had been jockeying for position in front of a mirror while they combed their hair (perhaps they found it hard to part with a mirror). Before I left, I heard one parting gem: "Geez, I left my spiffire out front and I bet they gave me another ticket. I can't afford to keep paying them, especially if I buy that new car stereo with a dolby system."

Then, I assume, they drove the two blocks back to their house and went jogging. We seem to spend half our days devising clever ways to save time and energy and the other half complaining about boredom and obesity. Therefore, we exercise to get rid of the flab that shouldn't have been there in the first place. This has led to expressions in our vocabulary like, "Well, I've gotta roll," to which one can reply, "That's obvious, fatso." Of course, the case of the two weight room lads is different. They are hooked—they are weightaholics fighting the battle of the bulge. When they drive down for their pokey cheques, it would be a shame if they had to start a construction job which might get their hands calloused. Oh well.

This is CFRC

by Rob Bruce and Colin Brown
What is CFRC?

CFRC is an on-air campus radio station run entirely by volunteers from Queen's campus as well as interested faculty members and city residents. The station is run by station management and the student radio club, which does all on-air programming for the station.

When did CFRC begin?

CFRC is one of the oldest radio stations in Canada, broadcasting since October, 1922. Originally begun as an experiment by the Engineering Department, the station grew until 1954 when an FM transmitter was obtained and CFRC-FM began broadcasting.

What is the status of CFRC?

At one time, CFRC was a commercial station, but a decision was made to drop all commercial production and the station is now licensed for a strictly non-commercial format. This means we are not able to sell air time to promote products or gain revenue from the promotions of these products. The station is owned and operated by Queen's University and all funding comes directly from the University or from alumni grants.

What about the 40c earmarked for CFRC in the fall/winter student fees?

The 40c paid by each student to CFRC goes directly to the CFRC Sports Trust Fund, which allows us to broadcast home and away games for the Golden Gaels football, hockey and basketball teams. During the fall/winter schedule, CFRC broadcasts almost 30 games, excluding playoffs. For away games, we must pay Bell Canada for a telephone line back to our studio and transmitter, as well as the expenses of the Sports crew. When a Gaels team makes it to the playoffs, CFRC will be thereto broadcast the game, wherever in Canada it may be held.

How does CFRC obtain its records?

Contrary to popular belief, the station does not receive a lot of free, promotional albums. Record company representatives often visit the station and deliver some promo albums, however the majority of our material must be purchased from the manufacturer.

Who decides the type of music heard on CFRC?

CFRC and CFRC-FM have a license with the C.R.T.C. Under the terms of this license, we must agree to play a certain quota of different music. For example, we have agreed to play 20 percent new material and 33 percent Canadian content on AM, with 10% Cancon on FM. Though these are restrictions, they are easy to meet in most cases and in no way hinder an announcer's choice of music for a show.

Why are CFRC's broadcast hours restricted?

As you may know, we broadcast Thursday and Friday evenings as well as through the weekend. The reason for this is that our FM transmitter often interferes with some delicate instruments in the engineering and physics labs.

What is the future of CFRC?

In October of last year we celebrated our 55th anniversary, opening a new and sophisticated stereo control room. Through the kind help of the Ryan Foundation we are approaching the day when a new FM transmitter can be purchased and CFRC becomes a full-time operation.

How can I get involved with CFRC?

Come on down! Our studios are located in the basement of Carruthers Hall on the main campus. Drop by any weekday between 9 and 4 and we'll be glad to chat with you, or arrange an announcer or operator school for you. It's that easy.

Elrond's financial straits spells uncertain future

by Tim Greenwood

Unable to keep up its payments Elrond, a student housing co-operative, is in the process of renegotiating the payment schedule on its three million dollar mortgage from CMHC according to Elrond president John Monroe. Due to insufficient funds Elrond was forced to stop payment on the mortgage in January of this year but plans to resume payment in September. Monroe is optimistic about the negotiations, observing that Neil Wycik, a co-operative in Waterloo, successfully followed the same route a few years ago.

Before it faced severe financial difficulties of its own, Queen's University was able to guarantee loans, thus enabling Elrond to meet their mortgage payments during the summer months. With this option unavailable in 1977 Elrond stopped its payments in March and Monroe is concerned that unless steps are taken this will be the start of a pattern of financial deterioration.

Monroe provided a breakdown of the operating budget for Elrond which rests somewhere between seven and eight hundred thousand; three hundred thousand of this is mortgage payments, one hundred thousand goes to taxes, another one hundred thousand is spent on utilities and the final three hundred thousand is the normal operating budget. Monroe explained that even with full occupancy Elrond's revenue falls "considerably short" of being able to meet the mortgage portion of the costs.

Elrond has a three million dollar mortgage with CMHC which runs for fifty years. Due to the small sum Elrond has been able to continue paying its thirty thousand dollar mortgage with the AMS, and there is an agreement it does not have to begin paying its nine hundred thousand dollar mortgage from Queen's until 1980.

Elrond's financial difficulties began during its construction in 1972 when unforeseen additions and alterations had to be made, explained Monroe. Monroe noted that five other co-ops were built around the time of Elrond and two of these have folded, one of them being the infamous Rochdale. Monroe feels the way in which Elrond was built has made it an economically unsound operation.

Two years ago there was difficulty in filling Elrond during the fall-winter term but Monroe is hopeful this will not happen again this year. He said that one hundred and fifty applications are already in for next year and they are waiting for first year students to apply in July when they receive notice of their acceptance to Queen's. Monroe cannot foresee raising the rents very much as Elrond is already expensive in comparison to off-campus housing and he said they "can't conceivably charge more than residence."

Monroe does perceive the possibility for improvement in the summer operations. About one hundred students lease apartments from Elrond year round while the three hundred rooms in houses are rented for the school year, and to date only thirty to forty of these are rented for the summer. In an attempt to fill these rooms Elrond is advertising itself as a hotel with a tour agency hoping to attract students and the sort of people who would not automatically check into a hotel. Elrond also rents at monthly rates with special preference for people from the building.

Elrond typically has trouble finding residents this time of year but Monroe said that during the summer months Elrond often reaches fifty percent occupancy.

Monroe feels the lack of continuity in Elrond's executive positions presents a difficulty, for new individuals take over positions often unaware what has occurred before. Monroe's stint as president will end in February of 1979 when he will retire after a two year term.

In Memoriam

By Dorothy Tuer

"For all that they were by nature and by grace we bless and praise Thee, being mindful of their love of life, their loyalty and thoughtfulness toward family and friends, their minds and spirits searching, shining strong."

Padre Laverty

On April 29, 1978, Michael Wai-Ko Woo and Avalina Oi-Fu Ho both students of Queen's were killed in a tragic car accident, en route from Kingston to Toronto. Michael was a graduate of Engineering and Avalina was a third year Nursing student. Both students were members of the Chinese Club and Avalina sang in Queen's Best earlier this year.

In remembrance, a Michael and Avalina Trust Fund has been established to provide awards annually for deserving students. A singing award is planned in honour of the memory of Avalina Oi-Fu Ho. And on May 4, 1978, Padre Laverty conducted an In Memoriam service in Grant Hall in tribute to both these fine students. The above prayer quoted from the service perhaps best expresses the sympathy and respect that the Queen's Community feels toward the memory of these two after their tragic deaths.

Funding for Botterell Hall project halted

Staff

Construction of Botterell Hall, the new Medical Health Sciences Complex on Stuart Street, has been halted after attempts by the University to secure additional funding for the project failed.

The building of the long-awaited complex has been organized in two phases. The now completed Phase 1 of the project cost $11 million and involved the construction of the outer frame of the new Medical Health Sciences building and completion of the lower five floors. Phase 2 was originally estimated to cost $5 million and will involve the completion of the top six floors of the complex. Dr. Garfield Kelly, Vice-principal of Health Sciences, announced at a meeting of the Board of Trustees of Queen's held on April 7th that the Ontario government had decided to accelerate the financing of Phase 1, but to defer the financing of Phase 2 of the Complex for at least the next two years.

"We're not surprised, but we're disappointed," Principal Watts commented. The University has been seeking some commitment for funding from the provincial government for several months now without success. Although Queen's had never received approval for the second phase of the building, Principal Watts stated that the University had developed "high hopes" that Phase 2 might proceed since "additional funds granted by the government will ensure that the debt on Phase 1 will be paid off by the spring of 1979". With the elimination of this debt, it was hoped that funding for the second phase of the project might ensue.

Despite complications, Principal Watts said the most sensible way to deal with the problem is to persuade the government to proceed with funding. Both the Principal and Dr. R.B. Stewart, head of the department of microbiology and immunology, pointed out that the postponement of Phase 2 will result in additional costs for all. Already a great amount of money has been spent in maintaining the old basic sciences buildings at a functional level. To continue upkeep of these already outdated buildings, is simply "wasted money" said Principal Watts.

The already completed portion of the complex will provide space for the Health Sciences Library, the pharmacology department, Animal Care Services, New Cancer Research, as well as some classrooms and laboratories. The departments which will suffer from the funding complications, are those of anatomy, biochemistry, microbiology, and physiology, for they will not be able to move into Botterell Hall until Phase 2 is constructed.

Dr. V.C. Abrahams, department head of physiology, said he was "just absolutely destroyed by the news".

The situation of the biochemistry department is perhaps less serious but is still an inconvenience. They will be moving into the Crane department this summer and then again to the upper levels of Botterell Hall when Phase 2 is completed. As quoted in the Whig Standard earlier this year, the head of the department of biochemistry, Dr. P.H. Jellinek, said, "We're happy in that the department can be together, but it means two moves which is disruptive and expensive and we're still separated from the other basic sciences departments, the library, and the animals".

Unless the government is prepared to provide backing for the loan the University is reluctant to borrow further money to complete Botterell Hall. Principal Watts mentioned that the interest rate on such a high figure loan would be close to half a million dollars a year. Dr. Kelly hoped that government proposals for 1980-81 would provide the solution and said that "there is no question they will ultimately give us the money".

Illness hits bus line

by Tim Greenwood

Voyager Colonial bus drivers across Ontario chose the afternoon of Sunday May 14th to call in sick. Whether they all planned to visit their mothers, or whether a serious labour dispute was occurring was unexplained at news time.

A call to the Ottawa depot elicited the reply that the shutdown was the result of busdrivers embroiled in a labour dispute, while the general reaction at the Voyager depot in Kingston was "What strike?"

The dispatcher in Kingston said, "The drivers started to call in sick in Ottawa about two o'clock and it appears the sickness was contagious. Pretty soon everyone had called in except ten drivers. Right now we have a skeleton crew working."

A young driver who was still making the run between Montreal and Toronto said he had heard of no strike and if there had been a picket line he certainly would not have crossed it. He had not yet completed the two hundred and twenty days which are required to join the union and said that he would only stop driving when his boss told him to do so (he pointed toward the dispatcher). The head dispatcher was confident buses would soon be back on schedule. On Sunday night there were only two buses running from Kingston to Montreal and Toronto.

Mazo de la Roche Collection

New acquisition for library

Staff

The private library of Mazo de la Roche has been acquired by Douglas Library. Miss de la Roche is the author of the well-known Jalna novels, a series based on the fortunes of a British family who settled on an estate near Oakville, Ontario and built strong Canadian roots. The library contains not only her own writings but also Miss de la Roche's and her father's personal collection. Thus it is an important key to understanding the emotional, creative, and intellectual context of her novels.

Dr. Pullen of the English Department, in conjunction with Douglas Library, is responsible for the acquisition of this fine library. A special grant from Wintario and additional monies from the Chancellor Richardson Memorial Fund have made the purchase possible. This support comes in recognition of the international acclaim Miss de la Roche has received for her novels and for their dramatizations, and for the community services provided by Queen's University.

Street may remain closed

by Chris Hall

Kingston City Council will decide the future of Queen's Crescent, the street running in front of Victoria Hall between University Avenue and Albert Street, at the Monday, 8 May City Council meeting.

The street, which was closed last September as part of an experiment to make walking to class safer for students, may be left closed through October, 1978 and the winter if City Council so decrees.

According to Eric Thrift, Campus Planning Director, the Sub-Committee on Grounds of Queen's Campus Planning Committee has recommended to the City that the experiment be continued.

"We anticipate that the street will remain closed through the summer and hope that it will remain closed through the following school year."

Thar he blows

from the New York Times

Hell hath no fury like a woman stormed: Severe atmospheric pressure from women's organizations was cited by Richard A. Frank, director of the National Oceanographic and Atmospheric Administration, in explaining why, beginning with the 1978 tropical storm season in the eastern Pacific, half the hurricanes will henceforth be named for men. The second hurricane, or himmican, will be Bud, the fourth Daniel, and so on. In 1979, Florida may expect Hurricanes Bob, David and Frederic. Mr. Frank said the change had nothing to do with the fact his boss, Secretary of Commerce Juanita M. Kreps, is a woman.

Wanted: A teaching job for a teacher

by Lee Wetherall

And so I graduated. Teaching degree and excellent teaching reports in hand I strode hopefully onto the job market. With those high ideals about 'creating a meaningful learning environment for all the alienated high school students' still intact I mailed out resume after resume for positions within my field of expertise. And back came form letter after form letter indicating that the position for which I had applied had been filled by another candidate who had that incomparable and invaluable commodity known as "experience".

After six months of useless letter mailing I looked further afield and applied for a couple of jobs in Toronto, that mecca of unemployed teachers. To my amazement my phone calls to these principals elicited two interviews. So I was off to Toronto suitably attired and with my expectations rising. The interviews went well and both principals expressed surprise that someone with my excellent teaching reports and obvious rapport with students had not been hired yet, and had things been different and the school year not quite so well underway they would have hired me but they really needed someone with EXPERIENCE. One principal (and they were invariably men) even went so far as to jokingly comment on the irony of it all - you can't get a job without experience and you can't get experience without a job. That is the age old dilemma for people entering a field for the first time.

Christmas came and went and my student loan came due. I was still without employment as a teacher but not really without employment. I had procured by dint of hard searching the enviable position of cashier at a local soft drink distributor. It was for 4 hours 2 nights a week. Not a huge sum of money at $2.65 an hour. But I did get to work occasionally with those high school students who I had hoped to teach (I could even help them with their homework if it was not too busy). After a couple of months at this glamorous occupation I was laid off due to insufficient response to their late night business hours with the assurance that if anything came up I would be called in.

By this time I had given up on teaching for this year anyway and now began my search for a job which could use the one really valuable skill I had picked up over my years at school and University - an ability to type about 50 words per minute. Unfortunately those plum jobs had already been snatched up by all the eager young women who had so wisely graduated from high school with secretarial training.

During those weeks the Whig Standard's classified ad section and myself were inseparable companions. From early morning when I eagerly clutched last night's Whig to my bosom till late night when I grabbed my new copy in hopes of finding a job with my name on it we were seldom parted. And finally I was hired by a local answering service and learned the ins and outs of Kingston's doctors, lawyers and Indian Chiefs.

By the end of my time in that venerable establishment I could tell you who was divorcing whom and which lawyer had a drinking problem, amusing tales of illicit rendezvous and how many accidents there were on Kingston roads that night. Unfortunately none of which helped me get a job teaching in Kingston.

Still searching for a job I discovered the Queen's Gazette. An interesting publication which listed all the jobs available in the University for which you could not apply until they had screened all their internal candidates. After that period of time an outsider like myself could apply for the jobs that were left - invariably a book shuffler in the Library or a junior clerk in some obscure department. But I religiously applied myself to the task of getting into the Queen's job structure so that I could rise like yeast in warm water to the top.

And I got myself an interview for the position of intermediate clerk in one of the more prestigious departments. By this time I would have promised the interviewer my first years paychecks if s/he would only give me a job. But I had acquired a "friend" that is someone in the University who will speak for you to someone else in the University. Now I am against patronage and influence peddling on principle in any form for anyone else BUT, my God, after 8 months of no full-time employment I would have sold my mother and most of English-speaking Canada to Rene Levesque for a good 9:00-5:00 job. And wonder of wonders my "friend" and my personal assurances that I would love this particular job worked and I became one of 8000 people employed by those kindly benefactors from Queen's University.

So now I am the reigning Queen of the Photocopy room though I hope never to celebrate my silver jubilee. I can now make photocopies with the best and occasionally as a rare privilege I am allowed to type. Who says a poor girl from out West can't make "ood" in "Smug" opulent Ontario. Good in the way, if you hear of a teaching job in English, Man in Society or Drama, I am still available.

Dr. Millard Schumaker, Associate Professor of Religion and Ethics at Queen's Theological College, is among twelve Canadians who have been awarded John Simon Guggenheim Memorial Foundation Fellowships for 1978.

The Guggenheim Foundation appointed 292 Fellows for 1978, chosen from among 3,073 applicants. The Fellowships were awarded on the basis of demonstrated accomplishment in the past and strong promise for the future.

Dr. Schumaker's Fellowship, amounting to $12,000, is to support "An Analytical Study of the Gift Relationship in Moral Theory", which he will carry out during his sabbatical leave at New College, University of Edinburgh, Scotland.

Kingston Community Players granted $17,000

Actors offer free performances

by Sarah Scott

Queen's student Nancy Watson has been awarded the second largest Young Canada Works grant in the country. She was awarded $17,000 to fund a theatre troupe of ten, called the Kingston Community Players. The players will present free shows all summer throughout the area.

This month all ten are rehearsing every day to build up a repertoire of short plays that they will take to the Kingston community in June, July, and August.

Their agent, Loie Fallis, is booking a heavy schedule for the company starting on May 29, when they open at Ernestown High School. From that day on, the troupe will perform almost every day for old folks and kids, the blind and the handicapped, single clubs and one parent organizations, prisons and high

Everyone in the company is or has been a Queen's student. There are a few familiar faces and names in the group, including John Frizzel, Judith Thompson, David Green, Ann Holloway, Susan Williamson, Anne McMahon, Jamie Agar, and Nancy Watson. Paul McGlashan from the art department is designing the sets and Loie Fallis is the booking agent.

Some of the plays that they are working on were written by the actors themselves. Nancy Watson's play for children, All Colours Fall From The Sky will be produced along with a number of pieces adapted from Salinger.

Aside from writing and acting, each member of the company will direct at least one show, and they will all help with workshops in high schools to promote local theatre.

Not surprisingly, the group ran into a few bureaucratic wrinkles.

When Manpower phoned Nancy Watson to tell her that she had won the grant, they promised $20,000 for ten actors. This was exactly what Watson wanted, and she went on to hire ten actors, some of whom quit their summer jobs to join the project.

Sometime later, the local government representative, Mike Morgan, informed Watson that the grant was for only $17,000 and for eight actors. The fact that Watson had already hired ten actors did not disturb Mr. Morgan in the least. "This will be your first managerial decision. It will be good for you," he was reported to say.

Never mind the bureaucratic hassles: Nancy Watson's group is bound to baby a few faces and wrinkle a few chins this summer.

GRUB STREET

by Colin Brown

Grub-street (grub-betrl) 1630 1. Orig. The name of a street near Moorfields in London (now Milton Street) much inhabited by writers of small histories, dictionaries, and temporary poems; hence, the tribe of literary hacks.

The music is one of those haunting blues tunes whose deep, sexy bass line shuffles through the bars like an old cat casing an alley. A dame in a white dress and long gold gloves slinks through the audience with her microphone and cigarette holder, occasionally stopping for a casual puff or to flirt with one of the patrons. Back on stage the drummer's head is down as the rhythm of his brushes hiss into the hot and smokey cellar. Two guitarists sit on the edge of the stage and trade sensuous licks to the laid-back beat. And some guy with wrap-around shades, a clothes-brush and an old suitcase is keeping time as well.

A cafe in Greenwich Village? A scene from Casablanca? Le Jazz Hot? Perhaps. No, it's the Queen's Pub—that's right folks, the Queen's Pub.

Since they formed about a year ago, "Sorry We're Closed" has been providing us with some refreshingly creative material. Philip Beesly, Geoff Somers, David Skuse, Jane "Ruby" Johnson and "Milwaukee" Bob Mertens (or, in their words, "two grads, a prof, a good singer and a moron") played the pub last weekend, a trying task for any sort of unorthodox band. And they were a success. How could such a group as "Sorry We're Closed" succeed in the Underground? The Underground: that delicious black void of seventies stainless steel and Brador bottles (which, by the way, with a little better lighting would make a great pool-hall) where AM rock and disco blast of the carpeted walls with the intensity of a 4/4 cannon volley. To this environment came these strange minstrels of blues, folk and rhumba. How did they remain?

Perhaps the answer lies in the sheer originality of "Sorry We're Closed". What distinguishes them from so many others is the great sense of fun one gets watching them play. They have the ability to play in several musical genres, whether it be reggae, rock or country and keep each one distinctive and amusing. And the rhumba, too! When was the last time you had a free Arthur Murray how-to-rumba slide show during your evening's entertainment?

"Backstage" at the pub between sets the group lounges about in a make-shift dressing room, and there is so much laughter in the room one realizes these people enjoy each other just as much off-stage as they do on. Their approach to the music they play is a pointed one, they explain. If it's country, it's Dolly Parton. If it's rock, it's an old Monkees hit or "Walk Don't Run" (Do you remember the Ventures?) Struggling to ask a serious question, the reporter asks what they think of the disco craze, and the one style of music which is peculiarly absent from their act. "I think" Saturday Night Fever" wraps up the 70's on an intellectual level," comes one reply. "Sort of an Easy Rider" of the 70's." Hats off to the Pub for providing us with a band which doesn't sound like all the others. Sorry We're Closed has a unique blend of talent, humour and imagination; put those elements together and they spell artistic creativity, something which we could use a lot more of around here. They may not be predictable, but if you don't like unpredictable music just remember you can always go back to your cozy little room and play your "Saturday Night Fever" soundtrack and be content in the knowledge that it's being listened to by 20 million people just like you.

by Terrence Reynolds

Many people spend countless sums of money on dancing lessons in order to keep in step with the times, which discoses to show you what people will do to throw away their money. I propose to give eight easy pointers on how to properly disco dance in the pub, without paying for lessons and without having to listen to Disco Duck, a rather fowl song. Therefore, I will take a quack at the problem:

1: Go see Saturday Night Fever several times until you realize that the lyrics are meaningless and all the songs blur together. Therefore, you can respond to any drum, bass and groan and accept it as music.

2: Go to the pub with beautiful people. Know the right people in the pub (It is helpful to be on a first name basis with pub staff. If someone at your table complains about service, you can say, "Well, Betty had a rough night last night," and wink knowingly, or, "Well, Steve must be pretty exhausted after last night," and again wink knowingly, depending upon your sexual preferences.

3: Have enough money to afford the latest fashions which change approximately once per month. Does anyone remember white painter pants and rugby shirts? They had to be thrown out even before they got stained, although they do make good cloths for wiping the dirt off your Peugeot Ten-speeds. Golf shirts are great right now, and they seem to be par for the course, or, if you get the burlap ones, par for the course.

4: A good tan is a necessity. Do not think you are safe if you have an outdoor labour job, because your tan will be spotty and your friends will realize that your father does not own

General Motors. The tan must appear to have been made by hard laying on the waterfront, or from a trip to more exotic locations (like downtown Gananoque).

5: If a rock tape is being played, look with distaste upon the people on the dance floor. Those who have a working knowledge of jiving should dance to one or two early Beatles or Beach Boy songs, looking as bored as possible, as if the act of dancing is a concession to the rabble sitting down. Then take a seat and wait for Disco Inferno to begin.

6: When Disco Inferno starts you go en masse to the dance floor, dancing only with other beautiful people wearing John Revolta outfits. If, for some reason, you have to dance with an average looking partner, you dance with him/her beside your friends and pay attention to your friend of the opposite sex, rather than to the poor sod who asked you up in the first place.

Never, I repeat, never smile at your partner, nor make eye contact with them. This might lead the plebeian spectators to make the unnatural assumption that you have some liking or affection for the person with whom you are dancing.

7: Introduce a new dance (e.g. The Shuttle Bus Stop, a favourite of the A.M.S.) that you have learned up in Muskoka or at Bala, or for those with less mobility, at the Bay (Alexandria, that is, for the ignorant).

8: Your interest in classical music should not exceed a knowledge of a Fifth of Beethoven. As far as soundtracks go, you should only know the disco perfections of Star Wars, or you are impressed by Disco Close Encounters, which proves that you do not even need a melody for a disco hit. Your lack of musical knowledge can be so great that you will not be chastized if you think Night Fever was a sickness affecting King Arthur's men or that Disco Inferno was about the fire bombing of a disco (I can dream, can I not?). This is because disco is a nameless, meaningless, mindless placebo of slop, marketed and packaged even better than Brylcreme, although in the present case, a little dab will not do you.

Small Change kicks off NFT's Truffaut series

Film captures childhood's magic

by Chris Copp

Francois Truffaut in his film, Small Change (1976), has finally played out a hand that started with his study of juvenile delinquency in 400 Blows. Small Change is an expanded version of that world in which all children live. The film embraces the juvenile-at-large, each in his/her own way a deviant in the eyes of adults. The entire kiddie population is integrated in a hilarious kind of "cops and robbers" relationship with the grown-up community. Drawing from a variety of childhood experiences, Truffaut pits the magically indestructible children against each other, their parents and generally anything that threatens to inhibit their freedom.

The film is at its best in the confusion between innocence and cunning. These kids are rarely innocent, but use the conception of innocence as a guise for their adventures of dubious intent. The prime mover of delinquency in the film is young Julien LeClou, whose fight with his parents is totally one-sided. Forced to sleep in the streets and live off found coins at the fairground, LeClou is independent having no ties whatsoever with the world about him. His experience of growth is wholly a result of his cunning. Neglected and beaten at home, LeClou has never been afforded the shelter that a parent's idea of innocence provides.

Aberrations of LeClou's clever (if illegal) survival tactics are present to some degree in all of the children. One young girl, denied supper out at a restaurant, watches as her parents leave the courtyard of the apartment complex, at which point she grabs her father's megaphone and begins shouting, "J'ai faim! J'ai faim!" Alarmed neighbours mistake her cries as the pitiable expression of a starving child. Her cunning, however, is only displayed as a fitting form of retaliation against the arbitrary measures laid down by her parents.

But the war also rages between the youngsters themselves. When Golfier is given 8 francs for a haircut, the money is squeezed from him by two brothers who clip his locks in devil-may-care fashion. This incident is interesting in relation to the film's title, Small Change. The haircut money or "change" never does go towards the final job but slips into the hands of small children as if it had merely been dropped from the pockets of adults, like those who lose money on the fairground rides. The children thrive on an exchange economy that relies on these overlooked scraps of cash. In fact, their own affairs are as unnoticed as the francs the adults frequently misplace.

Ground control for the film's adventures is the school. Its yard is a meeting place for insult-exchange and gossip, and even the occasional "cute" dirty joke. The classroom is the child-container. The forced sense of order evident in the rows of quiet students acts as a collapsed spring for their boundless energies. The magic moment of class dismissal is celebrated in one scene where the impish Geory Desmoucheaux watches intently as the yard clock outside audibly thumps out the last minutes of the day's schooling. When asked a question in this final stretch, Geory stands to answer but upon rising merely bites his lip in anticipation of the buzzer. The delay builds the tension of this repressed classroom behaviour and the buzzer's eventual ringing takes on an orgasmic quality releasing the tiny students from its confines to enjoy life as they please.

To coincide fully with the portrayal of the charmed lives of his child characters, Truffaut has dispensed with straightforward narrative in Small Change to construct the film as a series of enigmatic moments. A little boy merely giggles after falling to the ground from a ninth story window and instantly Truffaut transforms a miracle into the commonplace. Unfortunately, throughout the film we are invited to view the children as superhuman, and eventually the wonderfulness becomes tiresome. Perhaps Truffaut should heed his own lessons in the film and realize that even a good fairground ride doesn't have to run very long before the customer loses something from the experience.

Deadhead pilgrims head south

The Grateful Dead arises in a concert tour and rejuvenates the creative spirits of our star reviewer, Tennessee Jed.

by Tennessee Jed
Kingston's Dead heads embarked on their bi-annual pilgrimage last week as the Grateful Dead pulled into the North Eastern U.S. for concerts at Syracuse and Burlington. Kingston served as a central take-off point for Deadheads across the continent. Bert Grant, who has devoted the past three years of his life to studying the life and works of the lead guitarist for the Dead, Jerry Garcia, flew in from Guatemala for this round of concerts.

R.I. "Rip" Cord, a Yellowknife resident flew in from touring Europe shortly before the shows. Other distinguished Deadheads including Phil "More" and Jamie Corbett from Toronto also made room in their busy schedules to catch their musical gurus in action.

The proceedings hardly disappointed them. Six Kingstonians were fortunate enough to get tickets for a remarkable gig at the University of Vermont gym in Burlington, Vt., where the 2,500 tickets sold out in three hours. The band responded with a screaming rock n' roll show that our leading Deadhead Walter Brown rated as one of the most intense he had seen. Who can blame CAC Henoweth for battling the authorities, including Vermont State Police, in order to secure a front line position at the show?

The Syracuse concert proved equally as potent. A contingent of fifteen Kingstonians weathered the best efforts of the U.S. immigration authorities to deny certain members of the party access to their country and were rewarded with a truly cosmic experience. The band played for well over three hours and the entire Kingston entourage danced and wailed all night long.

Greed breeds mediocrity

by Mary Joy Aitken

Well, the Stanley Cup finals are finally underway. And to almost no one's surprise, the finalists are again the free-wheeling, yet highly disciplined Montreal Canadiens, and the tight-checking, hard-hitting Boston Bruins.

Last year the powerful Canadiens lost but two games en route to their eighteenth Stanley Cup. This year, after defeating the stubborn Detroit Red Wings and sweeping past the Toronto Maple Leafs in four straight, the Canadiens have lost only one game. One wonders if they will lose another in the finals, which commenced Saturday night with Montreal winning easily over Boston, 4-1.

It has been suggested that these seemingly endless victories by Montreal have resulted in a boring display of hockey. And in particular, the blame has been placed on the Canadiens style of building a lead and then checking the opposition into the ice. But is this accurate?

If one examines the talent on the Canadiens, the calibre of most of the opposition in the N.H.L. (which is terrible) and the length of the regular season, exhibition games and finally the playoffs, one could easily conclude that it is the latter factors, not the former, that are responsible for the frequently less than exhilarating brand of hockey to which the viewer is subjected.

For the Canadiens, with the best defense, offense, and powerplay in the N.H.L., and with a tremendous depth of talent to draw on if needed, present clearly the most talent on any one team in the league. And if challenged by a strong enough opposition this talent is put into use and the viewer is treated to the offensive beauty of a Guy Lafleur, the speed of an Yvan Cournoyer, the defensive talent of a Bob Gainey or a Doug Jarvis, and the talent of the Montreal defensemen - particularly Robinson, Savard and Lapointe.

No, it is not the style of the Canadiens that results in boring hockey. There have been many brilliant games in the past involving the Canadiens and a strong opposition, for example the Boston Bruins, the Detroit Red Wings in the quarter-finals, and the strong Russian national team of a few years ago. Rather the dull and low-quality games seen with increasing frequency recently are the result of too many teams (eighteen in the N.H.L. alone) and far too many games. How can any player possibly give a good effort every night or even most nights if he is playing over one hundred games throughout the complete hockey season.

Thus the blame for these lifeless displays of hockey should not be put on the style of the immensely talented Canadiens, but to the poor foresight and greediness of the N.H.L. governors and executive who are, after all, ultimately responsible for the organization of the league and thus for the display on the ice.

Surprise upsets in NBA playoffs

by Bill Wilder

South of the border the National Basketball Association playoffs are taking place. The two teams who everyone thought would be in the finals have been eliminated. They are the Portland Trailblazers last year's champions led by Bill Walton, and the Philadelphia Seventy-Sixers led by Dr. J. Erving. Portland lost in the quarter finals to the Seattle Super Sonics, mainly because of injuries. The 76ers lost to the aging Washington Bullets.

The Bullets surprised everyone, first defeating the San Antonio Spurs in six games, and then they did it again to the 76ers, also in six games. The Bullets remind me of the "over-the-hill gang", Toronto Maple Leafs in 1967. They won the Stanley Cup that year with again stars such as Terry Sawchuk and Alan Stanley. The Bullets are led by Elvin Hayes, Bob Dandridge, and Wes Unseld. Between them they have a total of 129 years on this planet earth and - 29 years in the NBA. Yet they outran the cocky Spurs, and kept on cruising past the 76ers.

Now that the Bullets have reached the finals they must wait and see who wins the Seattle-Denver semi-final play-off. Denver is led by David

Convocation Notice

Students expecting to graduate in May (Graduands) should note the following:

1. All Convocations will be held in the Jock Hartley Arena.
2. The Convocation program begins promptly at the time scheduled. Guests should be in their seats at least 15 minutes prior to the scheduled time.
3. No tickets will be required for guests.
4. Signs will be posted on campus indicating Convocation Parking Areas.
5. Graduands should be in the preparation rooms, with hood and gown, 1 hour prior to the commencement of the Convocation Ceremony. Direction signs will be posted in the Physical Education Centre indicating the Preparation Room for assembly by degree. After organization and announcements, the graduands begin to line up roughly one-half hour prior to the start of the ceremony. The Convocation parade begins roughly 15 minutes prior to the start of the ceremony.
6. Gowns and hoods may be rented from the AMS just prior to your convocation. Information concerning gowns and hoods will be sent to the graduands by the Registrar's office.

Montreal dull, not Leafs

By Bill Wilder

Toronto fans have complained all year about the dull style of hockey played by the Maple Leafs. Harry Sinden, general manager of the Boston Bruins hockey club, complained that the Leafs kept his rink empty because "no one wants to see the puck iced eighty times per game."

However, after watching the Toronto-Montreal series, I feel it is the Canadiens who play dull hockey. They score a goal when they feel like it and play in a defensive shell for the rest of the game. Their style reminds me of Ali in the ring and his antics, except the Canadiens are a little more conservative. All the Canadiens have to do is wait until the end of May to have their names engraved on the Coupe de Stanley for the nineteenth time.

The only exciting part of the series was the acrobatics of Mike Palmateer and the spectacular rushes of Ian Turnbull. They are both Leafs and are supposed to play dull hockey.

The Leafs are a great hockey club as they showed everyone on their playoff series against the Islanders. Who else would lose ten of their last twelve games during the regular season and then come out and take a series from the League's third best team? However, the Leafs are dull and ice the puck eighty times a game. The Leafs didn't beat the Canadiens but who will? Being a Leaf fan means you can enjoy the ups and downs with the team. Being a Canadian fan means you are always up, and that's boring. Maybe they should give the Canadian a bye to the finals and let them represent Canada at the World Championships. However, that is a different story.

Misleading caption criticised

Dear Editor,

I wish to express my objection to your coverage of the death of Emmanuel Fernando as appeared in the May 9 edition of the Journal. My objection lies not in the facts portrayed in the article by Tim Greenwood, rather with regard to the overall appearance of the article and accompanying photo.

Anyone versed in the visual effects of layout of a newspaper page realizes that the reader's eye is initially captured by a photo. From there, attention is directed to the outline accompanying the photo, then progresses to the article headline and the article itself.

page three of the May 9th edition, Lifeguards under question, is highly misleading when one reads the facts of the case as presented in the article. In fact, the lifeguards were not under question, but were commended by the Kingston City Police and the university's Department of Safety for their handling of the situation.

To suggest that the lifeguards in question were incompetent in their actions, by implicitly stating this in a photo caption, without being able to factually support this suggestion, is action more suited to the National Enquirer than a function of the Queen's Journal.

Elrond failure would pose housing problem

Once again Elrond is faced with financial difficulties, only this time they appear to be much more serious. The student co-operative now seems to be coming closer to the day when it has to default on the mortgage held by the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, following the well-noted example of Rochdale College.

However, it seems unlikely that the C.M.H.C. would actually foreclose on the college, for the simple reason that the building is eminently unsuitable for any other purpose than the present housing co-operative. With the peculiar three-storey housing units inside the building, each holding twelve people, and the elevator which consequently only stops at every third floor, the C.M.H.C. would have to spend a tremendous amount of money in renovations to make the building useful for, for instance, an old age home.

Queen's, as second mortgagee, could perhaps move to take over the college, but this event is also extremely unlikely. The university is already facing severe financial problems and does not need this white elephant as well. The Board of Trustees has, wisely, shown no interest in this option.

But consider what would happen if, in its infinite wisdom, the C.M.H.C. did in fact decide to foreclose. Approximately four hundred students would be suddenly placed in the housing market, a market which for years has been one of the tightest in Canada. The small improvement noticed in the past two years would be completely eliminated, and rents for the available accommodation would climb again, particularly if the rent controls are allowed to terminate at the end of 1978. The rental housing market, particularly the student market would once again be critical. For a university which relies so heavily on students drawn from other cities (over 90 percent of the student body) the possible consequences in terms of declining enrollment could be quite severe.

It is hoped that Elrond can overcome its financial difficulties, both in order to prevent the housing market from relapsing into its chronically tight state, and to show that a student co-operative can work. Even if it fails there seems to be little possibility that it will not continue to provide student accommodation (although who knows what rent the C.M.H.C. would charge). But if the unlikely occurs and the C.M.H.C. takes Elrond off the student market, then the university will have to seriously consider taking over the building, or else providing other accommodation for students, such as the long-delayed, Queen's V project.

Marvell head and shoulders above the rest

By Tim Greenwood

For awhile this year I lived in a world of fantasy believing I could maintain a lifestyle of good food, abundant beer, and movies on my limited budget. To avoid such extravagances as the monthly trip to the men's hair stylist, I was in the habit of taking out the only pair of scissors in the house, blunt and clumsy as they were, and clipping brashly away. However, I soon grew tired of hiding out and wearing hats indoors waiting for the tattered bunches and clumps to grow into some semblance of order and symmetry.

Feeling a great deal of anguish I was prepared to give up my movies or my food when a generally impoverished but incongruously well-groomed class-mate of mine provided me with the solution to the dilemma. He told me about the Marvell School of Beauty, where for only $3.50 aspiring hair-stylists give professional looking cuts. He appealed to my gambling instincts when he told me I would have to sign a waiver giving up all legal right to redress if I felt the cut was not up to scratch.

Uneasy, I wandered up Princess Street the next day and found the Marvell School of Beauty; a small glass door in the side of a building a few doors down from Student Manpower. Catching one last glimpse of my wild shock of hair reflected in the glass door, I trundled up the steep and narrow flight of stairs into the clutches of fate.

Signing away my legal rights was less painful than I had expected. The slip of paper they handed me looked so innocuous and was passed to me in such a nonchalant manner that it seemed as though it was done in all hairstyling establishments.

I was barely able to peruse my way through half a Cosmopolitan before I was scooped out of my seat and led to my hairstylist. From the inside the Marvell School of Beauty does not look at all like a hairstyling salon.

The school occupies one large room, which looks like the floor of a factory or warehouse. This is accentuated by the several rows of students bending diligently over their work, the lockers standing against one wall, and the stern and upright woman who must have been the instructor, striding purposefully up and down the aisles, not unlike a foreman, fixing her intent gaze on the student, and then on that.

To my amusement (and perhaps my horror) I soon realized that most of the students were styling wigs on the heads of styrofoam dummies. I did not gain great comfort when I realized the only other customers were well-weathered elderly ladies having their hair styled, perhaps in a last ditch effort to attract the faltering attention of their myopic and unappreciative husbands.

Several curious and a few langorous glances greeted my presence; I guess a singular male presence, dishevelled as I was, broke the slumbrous spell cast by the sea of all-pervasive femininity.

My hairstylist (who I gleefully learned was almost a graduate) quickly shampooed and dried my hair with a little biographical data given in answer to my questioning. She then propped up sections of my hair with bobby pins and, gazing in the mirror, I whimsically imagined myself strapped into an electric chair, electrified, with all my hair on end. She explained this procedure was the "Marvell Methods," and she then proceeded to systematically cut each section of my hair the desired length.

I was unable to follow the progress of my haircut without my glasses, but after I was blown-dry, and had put my glasses back on, I was really pleased with the final result. Feeling it was the best "short cut" I had ever had, I gladly paid the $3.50 and left a small tip and was still able to feel I was being economical.

Needless to say in a very short time my hair became as dishevelled as ever, the part which had been temporarily in the middle wandered gradually to the side and all my hair-pulling during periods of deep and profound thinking sent my hair off in all directions just as if it were up in the bobby pins again. Still I know if ever I should want the luxury of that well-groomed feeling again, for only $3.50 (and a little luck) I know where to go.

For those of you hirsute students who look upon yourselves as gambling men or women, or who just feel the pinch of the dollar, try the Marvell School of Beauty.

Space opened by storage of unused library material

by Tim Greenwood

In order to clear space in the stacks lesser used materials from the Douglas Library are now in the process of being identified for storage in a warehouse at West Campus. Chief Librarian, Margot McBurney explained that to date about 66,000 monographs (books) have been identified while a policy concerning the storage of serials has not yet been determined by the Senate Library Committee and the Faculty. Ms. McBurney said the Library currently has use of one quarter of the warehouse but one half will be available if needed.

The added space will not be immediately filled by new material. Ms. McBurney stated, but instead reorganization will be undertaken to make present materials more accessible. Before material which is currently in storage can be moved in to the space a great deal of cataloguing must take place she said.

Ms. McBurney explained "It is difficult to maintain a collection when one is tight for space." There is greater danger of books being misshelved or being damaged she said.

The undertaking of an inventory this summer for the first time in twelve years is another step Ms. McBurney views as making the Library material more accessible for students.

Commenting on other library improvements, Ms. McBurney noted the addition of one-hundred study spaces, most of them in the reserve room, as well as the carpeting in the purple room, which has led to a significant reduction in the amount of noise.

Queen's Quest raises $5 million in 1st yr.

by Graham Sellers

Queen's Quest, a five-year campaign to improve the quality of education at Queen's, has harvested more than half of its $10 million goal in this first year of canvassing. As of May 19, 1978, the fund has received $1,400,000 in cash and $4,500,000 in pledges, and according to Lois Miller of Queen's News Services, "money is coming in so fast that the figures are out of date by the time we publish them."

James M. Courtright, Vice-Principal of Development and Information, is optimistic that the campaign will exceed its goal, but he notes that "the last $2 million will take as much effort as the first eight." At present, personal gifts from Alumni, students, friends, faculty and staff have provided $2,366,000 and corporations and foundations have contributed $3,435,800. After these sources have been exhausted, Queen's canvassers hope for support from new parents and alumni, bequests, and corporations who are presently reluctant to contribute because of poor business conditions.

Vice-Principal Courtright attributes much of the campaign's success to on-campus support from students, faculty and staff. "This support has been a tremendous lever to open doors for us...to be able to tell people that the students have given three quarters of a million and the faculty and staff have pledged one half a million dollars." Queen's is not only competing with other universities like Toronto and McGill, which have each mounted $25 million fund-raising campaigns, but also with other charitable organizations like hospitals, symphony orchestras, the Salvation Army and environmental groups. According to Courtright, the on-campus support has "evaporated people's skepticism and cynicism" about the Queen's cause, and has helped to establish much-needed public credibility for Queen's Quest in the "fund-raising market."

"This internal participation is a Queen's phenomenon," Courtright told a Journal reporter "It is not duplicated to the same degree anywhere else in Canada. It's one of our best selling points."

Courtright noted that the same unique "Queen's spirit" also generates a great deal of support from alumni and friends of Queen's, who have so far contributed over $1 million, despite the fact that Queen's has only recently terminated a $6.5 million Capital Program campaign (1970-75) to provide funds for the John Deutsch Centre and other buildings.

Realistic goals have also helped to establish public credibility for the campaign, according to Courtright. An original survey of the campus produced requests for funds totalling $30 million, but the Principal's Steering Committee honed this amount down to $10 million and established priority areas for funding. Vice-Principal Courtright stated that the $10 million figure was selected to correspond proportionately with the $25 million campaign by the University of Toronto, which has three times the population of Queen's.

The campaign required two years to plan, and is organized around volunteer committees under the national chairmanship of Cedric E. Ritchie, Chairman and President of the Bank of Nova Scotia Canvassing is conducted on a peer group basis, from one individual to another, often as an exchange of favours Courtright

NUS conference calls for more anti-cutbacks

by Colin d'Eca

The Sixth Annual National Union of Students Conference held at Memorial University, St. John's, was hosted with traditional "Newfie" style. The screech and beer flowed, and delegates took advantage of the bars of the city which only close for an hour to clean up.

The conference itself got off to a slow start last Wednesday with procedural hassles over the Agenda. The Central Committee's report later came in for criticism for not providing sufficient focus, direction or leadership for what was to be the organization's major and only campaign for next year — the anti-cutbacks campaign. Momentum sprang from a motion setting out the political philosophy of the campaign moved by the Progressive left caucus, and the announcement of the Begin Social Services Bill, which threatens to cut off federal money to Social services much as the Establish Programme Fundings system did to post-secondary education. The C.C., caught up in their usual paranoia over conspiracy plots, abdicated their responsibilities to a hastily-formed cutbacks-strategy Committee of seven (chaired by Colin d'Eca). The committee literally worked around the clock to incorporate the consensus opinion of the small group discussions and the directives of various workshops. The result was a paper setting out the focus for a national anti-cutbacks campaign which was unanimously approved at the final plenary on Sunday morning.

Other highlights of the conference were, an emotive debate on the question of recognizing L'ANEQ as a co-equal National Union of Students. Much acrimonious debate had occurred at the Calgary Conference last October over this issue, which also included at that time a call for the right of self determination for the people of Quebec. That motion was defeated in a postal ballot, but surprisingly the new motion passed with few schools objecting this time around. However, whether any working relationship can be struck by NUS with L'ANEQ now seems dubious, given the assumption of control by L'ANEQ by the right-wingers of the Parti Quebecois.

On the recommendation of its International Relations Committee, NUS has agreed to enter into formal links with other National Unions. Liaison will be initially for information exchange, but also political co-operation on certain issues would be taken up when appropriate. It was also agreed to send a delegate to observe the 11th International Festival of Youth and Students in Havana, Cuba, July 28th to August 4th.

The main topic of the Conference involved restructuring the organization to answer fundamental problems of the Unions freedom and ability to attract new members; this was not resolved. Plans to elect two full-time executive members had to be shelved following the Treasurer's report which called for a deficit budget of $15,000 next year. There was heated argument over these positions and heavy lobbying including blackmail threats to the OFS executive to keep quiet from UTSAC over the right Caucus (York, CYUSF, Waterloo, Glendon, Windsor and Ryerson), but most delegates saw economic sense and voted down the proposal. Plans to set up constituency groups in NUS as a means of attracting new members were upset when the graduates refused to formally incorporate the NMatlional graduate Commission on a resolution from the Ontario Graduate Association, and the colleges and Undergraduate constituency groups also rejected the proposed plans as too premature and ill-considered. The whole issue will be raised again at Western Ontario in October.

Courtright notes that the $10 million figure is only 3 percent of the $300 million that will be needed to run the university over the five year period, but he says it will bridge some difficult gaps in areas that are crucial to maintaining the quality of education at Queen's.

stated. Five separate brochures have been prepared to help volunteers present the Queen's cause to parents, alumni, faculty and staff, the Kingston Community, and corporations and foundations. Careful planning has co-ordinated the efforts of the canvassing army, and has enhanced the campaign with distinguishing extras like the Queen's Bee emblem.

Queen's Quest funds will be used to improve existing facilities rather than to expand into new areas. The library system will receive $2,000,000 to purchase new materials, especially current subscriptions, and to catalogue or repair books that are presently out of circulation. $2,500,000 will be used to purchase modern scientific and technical equipment such as spectrometers, biomedical engineering units and mini computers. Buildings such as the Old and New Medical Buildings (1858 and 1907), the Old Arts Building (1880) and the original Douglas Library (1924) will be renovated, at a cost of $3,250,000, to accommodate new facilities. $1,250,000 will be devoted to academic development in neglected areas, such as visits from eminent scholars to bridge gaps in the faculties, and the preparation of Canadian-oriented teaching materials. The remaining $1 million will provide fellowships, bursaries and scholarships for students, and interim support for research projects that might be forced to disband in the periods between major grants.

Campus Comment

BY Graham Sellers

This week we asked students to comment on summer entertainment and activities on campus, or the lack of them, and whether the AMS or any other organization could or should contribute to campus summer life.

SUSAN BREAU Law '79

I was here last summer as well and the campus just dies. The only activity I can remember was sitting around the pub and drinking, and it was always full. But I find that boring; we need alternatives. Maybe the separate faculties manage a few activities, but the AMS hardly does anything. There could be smokers, or an intercession dance, a Summer School dance; and a few different activities would be nice, like a Summer Arts Festival. I know there's not as many students, but dances or festivals wouldn't be hard to arrange. There are still Grads 950 as well as Intercession students 1300 and Queen's students with jobs. That's a market for entertainment.

TIMOTHY WHITEHEAD M.A. Economics

There's not much going on, but the summer's just started, and maybe things will pick up. NFT (National Film Theatre) and the pub are still running, and sports are always available. I don't indulge much in entertainment during the year, so it's hard to say I'm missing it in the summer. A few concerts would be nice, and I miss the Speaker program, but there's just not enough students. I think the AMS is probably limited. In winter

DIANA HOPKINS Life Sciences '80

There's a lot going on if you can find it. There's the Phys-Ed Centre, NFT have films a couple of nights a week, and there's the pub; very little live entertainment though. But rather than spending money trying to entertain 1300 Intercession students, the AMS should concentrate on the Fall and Winter terms. Anybody here as an intercession student is taking one or two courses, and then has a job, and I'm sure they've got lots to do with their free time. Any other time of year you can't spend time reading books or going to the Phys-Ed Centre. There are six theatres in Kingston, the Tap Room, Fin-nigans, Muldoons or the Underground, and friends are often staying around in the summer. I don't think there's any lack of entertainment.

JANE MORLEY Law '80

I think there's a terrible lack of communication and focus. Nobody seems to know what's going on. Activities could be organized if anyone took the initiative. The pub might lose money on lunches, but it's always full in the evening; maybe wine could be sold at subsidized prices. Somebody should get an organization going.

a lot of the activity has to be organized indoor events, centred on campus, whereas in the summertime there's a lot more opportunity to go elsewhere. People just don't stick around campus, so the need for entertainment isn't great.

1200 turn out for youth concert

by Paul Seay

On Tuesday May 16, The Frontenac County Board of Education (FCBE) presented a youth concert at Jock Hartly Arena featuring "We Are The Music Makers." This group, comprising of approximately 1200 people, consisted entirely of students from the Elementary and Secondary school levels.

Performing for a full house, the Frontenac County Elementary School Choir of 1000 voices almost stole the show. This choir sang a variety of traditional and Canadian songs throughout the concert, under the direction of Betty McKendry from the Winston Churchill Public School. Yet the Frontenac County Youth Singers, under the direction of Gordon Sinclair, gave the audience a professional performance of classical and folk songs. The Youth Singers, a choir of thirty voices from the senior Secondary level, was formed last year and evidently put a great deal of time into their talented performance of difficult songs.

In conjunction with the two choirs were three bands: one from the junior level, one from the senior level, and an impressive string orchestra from both levels under the direction of Robert Clark from L.C.V.I. The orchestra, with the help of the Kingston Youth Orchestra on bases, performed Vivaldi's Sinfonia No. 1 and the Fiddle Dance by Fletcher.

The idea for this concert came from Mr. Jim Coles, co-ordinator of the Arts for the FCBE. Earlier this year, Mr. Coles approached the music teachers of the area with his idea of uniting all the music programs into one so as to express the importance of the Arts in the education system. Furthermore, the concert was to serve as a "wrap-up" for the work accomplished during the school year. However, nothing of this size had ever been attempted in Kingston and much of the credit for the success of the event must go to the individual music teachers from the thirty-one schools represented at the concert. They had little time to rehearse as a group and the standing ovation at the end of the concert was well deserved by all those involved.

Mr. Coles hopes that this event will be continued annually and that it will stimulate other music activities in the area, like a city-wide band, thus allowing students to become involved in other musical organizations outside the classroom. Proceeds from the tickets went to the FCBE to help pay for the

OOT & ABOUT IN KINGSTON

by L. Nightingale

Just when you thought that the leaves had packed it in and left in disgust for a permanent exile in South Carolina, they have finally returned once again in their verdure splendour, ushering in the fairest of all seasons. And with them comes me, your friendly host in this regular column dedicated, appropriately enough, to the many joys of summertime in Kingston. I'm sure that for many of you this will be your first Kingston summer, and now after a couple of grey and endless winters you are no doubt becoming pleasantly surprised to find the pulchritude of this fair village. Let me lead you then, each week, to a few of the good times available, of which you may be unaware. I will take you on a few good bicycling trips, to some little known drinking spots, and to some rare and delightful swimming holes.

But first, why not get out and explore the nether reaches of Kingston on your own? The best way to do it is on bicycle. The pace is comfortable; fast enough to be exciting but slow enough to really enjoy the areas you are passing through. Explore all those parts of town you've never been in before. Most importantly do it very early in the morning, around six or six-thirty. The streets are clean, the air cool, and best of all, the city is blissfully quiet. There is little traffic, especially in the residential streets, and no pedestrians to watch out for.

Ride in and out of the maze of little streets in north Kingston, through the 'Fruit Belt' area immediately north of Princess Street, between Division and Montreal Streets. Laid out like a plate of spaghetti, these streets are narrow and winding and are home to the Italian and large Portuguese communities. The houses are old and wooden but are obviously cared for well with their neat little gardens and turquoise picket fences. Soon you'll be farther north, in the really tough neighbourhoods of outer Montreal and Rideau Streets. No nine-year-olds smoking cigarettes on the street corner at this time of day. Soon you'll pass Quatrochi's and then the old railway station (worth a visit) and eventually out to the horribly sterile subdivisions near the 401. Come back down Division Street but cut into the Kingscourt area where you will find street after street of nearly identical tiny white frame houses built during the second war.

Getting tired? You're close to Tim Horton's. The coffee is great and you can pick up a bag of yesterday's doughnuts at half price to take home.

Now you're ready to wend your way south and west through the middle-class enclaves. Cruising through here, enjoy the maple trees that reach out from either side of the street creating a tunnel of green. Soon you'll be out to Portsmouth. Head south, past St. Lawrence College and straight into the Psychiatric Hospital grounds. This is undoubtedly the nicest park in Kingston, perfect anytime you need a quiet place to contemplate.

Start heading back into town now, but first peddle through Portsmouth Village. Almost engulfed by the city, it nonetheless retains the air of the lakeside hamlet it once was. Now you're passing the old penitentiary and the limestone mansions of King Street West. Turn down Alwington Place and see where the really wealthy people live. Quite the contrast to the corner of Rideau Street and Raglan Road, isn't it? Continue down King Street. You can stop and cast your mind upon more cosmic matters under the "Time" sculpture. Soon you'll be into the city park and meandering slowly through the old Sydenham Ward.

Your adventure is nearly over. It's time for breakfast. There are about four (maybe more) restaurants that have 99 cent breakfast specials. I recommend Brock Place on Brock Street between Wellington and King. Sit down and relax with a Globe and Mail. You've been out for an hour and a half, maybe two hours. People are heading for work now, and the sun feels warm through the glass. It's been a good day, hasn't it? And best of all it's only just begun.

Suicide in grad residence

Staff

On Sunday May 14, a Queen's student living in the graduate residence took his own life by hanging himself. The student was doing course work for his Ph.D. at the time and informed sources said he was doing well and was not under academic pressure.

Mr. Luker, responsible for the security patrols at Queen's, said that he was contacted by the police on Saturday night after they had received an emergency phone call. Luker sent a security patrol to the graduate residence at about 11:30 and when they woke the man they thought had made the call he behaved as anyone might after being awakened from their sleep.

On Sunday night the police responded to a concerned telephone call from the man's brother-in-law, and went to his room where they found his body, Luker said. According to the Coroner, the man had been dead for about 12 hours. Luker stated:

A neighbour who was questioned by the police said that the man in question left the residence almost every weekend, but seemed on the whole to be "a fairly happy guy".

Waterfront saga - hotels, mud flats or park the ongoing tale of negotiation and intrigue

by Barb Muirhead
Kathy Grant

In Sydenham Ward, between Clarence and Lower Union Streets, below Ontario St., lies an unsightly vacant stretch of land. Ownership and utilization of the property is perhaps one of the most hotly contested issues in the past one hundred years of Kingston's history. At present, the city is studying a $30 million development proposal which, if accepted, will change the site from wasteland to industrial-commercial complex. This is not the first time the city has reviewed a development proposal for the area. Yet, over the past decade, the area has remained an eyesore, and a highly contentious local issue.

The history of the area between Ontario Street and the water has been traced from one of Indian camps, batteries, hotels, parks, railroad stations, and so on. By the 1960's a large chunk of the land, the Fairbanks-Morse property, had fallen into disuse when the ailing locomotive company was bought out. In June, 1970, the so-called dynamic young developer, from Ottawa, William Teron - who had spear-headed the Kanata development near Ottawa, and the Holiday Inn in Kingston - had won over City Council to the Marina City proposal to develop the site. In 1966, the Teron-controlled 'Murney Developments' had purchased the Swift Dock and Plymouth Square, including the historic Counter House, (see map), and had obtained a quit claim patent from the federal government. In March of 1970, Teron had announced his firm's intention of acquiring the Fairbanks-Morse land, while promising to preserve and restore the Counter House.

The Teron 'Marina City' proposal was to be a package deal, including on the Murney property a hotel, apartments, offices, and shops, and on the other 'Teron' block, apartment units. Teron wanted an "all or nothing" arrangement, with quit claims issued by all three levels of government. He negotiated with the city, and obtained an agreement whereby the city could not rezone the area for 15 years. Under the Official Plan, the development control act gives the city power to regulate the exterior appearance of buildings, and their distribution on the lots, but not with regard to height or density. Teron had wanted not only the Kingston Shipyards, but the federally owned drydock as well. In fact, Clause 32, stating that if the dry dock was used or re-zoned by the federal government by June 1st, 1971, Teron was no longer bound by the site plan agreement. When the dry-dock was leased to a ship-repair industry, Teron expressed his frustration in being 'forced' to re-plan his 'Marina City' project. In the summer of 1971, the Fairbanks-Morse structures were torn down, as well as the vandalized Counter House, which Teron claimed was to be expensive to renovate. Meanwhile, there had been no development on the Murney property. By August, Teron had begun to talk in terms of developing only between Clarence and Johnson Streets. Yet another holdup resulted when the CN tracks were to be removed. The last straw, Teron claimed, came when the Kingston Mills to Lemoine Point Waterfront Committee challenged the severance which had finally been granted by the Royal Canadian Horse Artillery Association, in 1972. When Teron became head of Central Mortgage and Housing at about the same time, the entire project was scrapped, the property being put into trusteeship under Urbanetics Ltd. With the exception of the Frost-the-Mover, Pike Salvage, Kingston Marine Museum block, the land has remained vacant.

Under Paron development, consideration of the area by the city has been resurrected. The 15 year no re-zoning stipulation negotiated with Teron, it is claimed, legally entitles the new owners - Rollins and Neilson construction companies, to the same provisions. Paron is seeking an amendment to the agreement, with regard to distribution, as well as a building permit, which must be recommended by the technical staff. The new proposal calls for a 16-store condominium structure, 30 percent glass, as well as an office complex and motel to be of reflective glass, on the Murney property. Shortly to be submitted, there will be a proposal for the 'Teron' block.

Despite the lack of public input, and generally secretive discussions over the Teron agreement, the City was assured that public access would be a prime consideration. Public opinion appears to be much more vociferous over the Paron proposal, but many Kingstonians are concerned over the degree of public accessibility, in details such as the public walkway, which might be as much as one storey above the water level. There's still some question as to the ownership of several parcels of land (see map). Citizen interest groups such as the Sydenham Ward Ratepayers' Association, potential condominium owners, as well as the construction industry, has all expressed disparate points of view on the issue. While it is hoped that the development would help revitalize the downtown area, there is also the fear that such buildings would block the picturesque view of Lake Ontario enjoyed at present, and that the scheme generally is not compatible with Kingston's historical low-key profile.

Will the land remain vacant? Could or would the city buy the land for park or other use? Have the majority of Kingstonians accepted as a foregone conclusion, some form of development on the site? Or, is there enough opposition to warrant demands for greater controls on height, density, and public access, to stall the project? Finally, does the city have any legal recourse with regard to ownership of the land, or the original terms of the agreement? These questions will be discussed at greater length next week. Stay tuned!

They booed our national anthem in Toronto last weekend

On two separate occasions at Exhibition Stadium, fans gathered to see the Toronto Blue Jays play the New York Yankees jeered singer Ruth Ann Wallace's attempts to perform O Canada in English and French. The boos were long and pronounced, occasionally bracketed by spatters of applause. The two incidents received extensive media coverage across Canada, and on Tuesday the House of Commons passed a resolution commending the Blue Jays management for their brave stance on the bilingualism issue. Ruth Ann Wallace will be back to sing again, but not for a while.

It is possible to dismiss the whole matter - after all, what or who don't Blue Jays fans boo? It is easy enough for me to imagine myself sweltering out in the bleachers, dying for a beer that a neo-Victorian Tory creed has denied me, waiting to see the New York Yankees come out and play baseball with the home town hopetuls and reacting with some disbelief to a lady down on the field crooning away in a language which I don't understand. I don't think I'd boo but I doubt I would applaud wildly and compassionately either.

Yet we cannot dismiss the nagging and disturbing vibrations that such an incident produces. When a spectator, in this case only sixteen years old, justifies his catcalls with, "If they don't want to be part of our country, why should we sing their national anthem?" it's time to do some serious thinking, like most people who give a damn about the future of this country are doing these days.

It is no more a matter of understanding. English Canadians have been trying to understand the French language and culture for over two centuries, and often they've been trying about as hard as some of Toronto's baseball fans. The federal government's attempts to make Canada a bilingual nation have succeeded in their attempts to make English Canadians understand French Canadians. But they have not succeeded in winning the respect of the English speaking community.

It's not their national anthem, but our national anthem. We can sit in the stands and gripe about French being "rammed down our throats" as much as we choose, but the more we do so, the more we play into the hands of the men and women whose soul purpose it is to tear the Canadian map to shreds and scatter its pieces in the wind. Sure, let's all have a big laugh at Ruth Ann Wallace. Rene Levesque is laughing all the way to the bank.

Unless Canadians, English and French, start showing a little respect for each other, they may soon find themselves with nothing to boo about. And somehow I feel that would leave us all feeling a damn sight worse than any lady at a baseball game.

by Colin Brown

Let's have the facts... all the facts please

Another suicide has disrupted the Queen's community. While the question of university suicides is one many would certainly leave in the closet, it's time we had the facts and figures on what, unfortunately, has become a regular occurrence at Queen's.

Ever since suicides became common at Canadian universities the administrations have sought to hide the figures, often under the auspices of protecting the families involved. But as suicides increase as the years go by, it is salient Queen's students know how many of their colleagues no longer feel a desire to continue living.

The recent suicide in grad residence is now common knowledge, but how many other suicides occurred during the last academic year which will go unnoticed by the vast majority of people? What sort of environment is responsible for anyone to contemplate such action?

It has been rumoured that over the past five years Queen's has had the dubious distinction of having the highest suicide rate of all Canadian universities. Queen's high academic standing and obscure admissions policy have costs, but they appear to be well hidden. Surely the students who attend Queen's should know of the situation in which they spend four years of their life. If Queen's does in fact have the highest rate we should be actively seeking to reduce this rate immediately. Surely the administration would not deny the solution to this problem will come sooner and will be much superior if we all have the facts to deal with. Let's have the facts, the truth may hurt but the hurt will only get worse if unattended.

Job Bank, which has been doing an excellent job of finding part-time and occasionally full-time employment for students is now in the unusual position of having more jobs than students to fill them. When the service began in early May jobs were taken almost as soon as they were posted, but this week the board in the John Deutsch Meeting Area is covered with unfilled job notices and the usually crowded area is often-times almost deserted.

For a summer in which high student unemployment had been predicted it is hard to understand this phenomenon. The directors of this student run service put on a full-scale effort to get jobs for what was perceived to be a needy student population, and the Kingston community responded admirably to this need. Let us hope that the present dearth of eager workers reflects a brightening of the job situation and perhaps the finding of full summer employment as a result of contacts made through Job Bank.

It's all a matter of Degree

By Barbara Boucher

A glaring sun beamed down upon several hundred smiley-faced grads this past Friday and Saturday as parents hearts were warmed with pride. Once again, in keeping with a long established tradition, Education, Rehab, Commerce, Engineering, Law and Meds grads passed through a flurry of ceremonial ritual to accept their respective degrees.

Notable among the day's events was the conferring of honorary degrees to such eminent guests as Dr. J.W. Beaver, speaker at the combined Engineering and Commerce grad, Dr. Elizabeth MacGill, an accomplished aeronautical engineer, and Dr. Laidlaw of U.N.B. A handful of exceptional engineering students received recognition for their outstanding academic merit as each was issued an award in his area of specialization. Gerry Jackson, recipient of the Commerce award, received full acknowledgement for his scholastic achievements.

To a chorus of resounding applause from both friends and strangers alike, A. Kirk Purdy graciously accepted the coveted Tricolor award.

Now that I've got my degree...

Faculty house report back to committee

by Anne Johnson

The report investigating the idea of Faculty Houses was sent back to committee by Summer Council last Wednesday with the suggestion that discussion of the negative effects of faculty houses be expanded.

The AMS struck the committee last April in response to a request by the University for input on the general concept of faculty houses. Particular consideration was to be given to the possible effects of those houses on the student community.

It was this key section of the report that was deemed inadequate by Council.

The strongest argument against the establishment of Faculty houses was the possible fractionalization of the campus. Dave Gordon, Summer Council representative and Paul Steep, a former AMS executive member pointed to the existing Meds, Law and Grad houses as examples of how the faculties could be sectionalized and isolated.

They noted the houses tend to serve as social meeting places for members of the individual faculties and are thus insulated environments. Dave Gordon suggested rather than setting up individual faculty houses, efforts should instead be directed towards placing more emphasis on the University Center as a social meeting place for all Queen's students.

Gordon further noted that Queen's students have donated $600,000 to the building of the new University Center in addition to providing over $13,000 per year in operating funds.

The Committee felt that the problem of fractionalization was surmountable and suggested some positive aspects of faculty houses. The report noted they could provide focal points for those students with similar academic interests, offer activities and conference space, and serve as information centers with the provision of magazines, textbooks and newspapers.

The university is presently entertaining a request from the Commerce Society to rent a University-owned house for the establishment of a faculty house.

The AMS has yet to take a firm stand on the issue, and at present the status of the Commerce house is still unclear.

Renovations cause fire

by Tim Greenwood

A crew from the fire department accompanied by two police cruisers rushed over to the John Deutsch University Centre last Thursday night in answer to a call concerning a small pile of asbestos which was smoldering in the basement. It took the firefighters about fifteen minutes to quench the fire.

Norm Hart, the general manager of the University Centre, told the Journal he had called the Queen's emergency number after his secretary Janet Hoolihan had reported the smoke. With their own crew already off for the evening, Queen's called the fire department, explained Hart. The fire began downstairs where the old boiler is being cut apart to be replaced by a smaller and more efficient model. The workmen were cutting with acetylene torches and Hart assumes "a spark from the cutting fell into some soggy old newspaper and asbestos installation and started smoldering".

Explaining his decision to call in assistance on such a small fire, Hart said he is quite concerned about the potential danger of a fire in the building. "There are about 150 residents upstairs, a few commercial offices, and a bank here," he observed.

Gordon Eligh from Ottawa

Alumni award presented to Eligh

by Jennifer Conkie

The Kingston Award of the Queen's Alumni Association has been presented this year to Gordon Eligh. Given in recognition of outstanding service to Queen's and the community, the award is presented each year at the annual meeting of the Kingston Branch of the Alumni Association. This year's dinner and presentation was held on May 11th.

Mr. Eligh, 61, a native of Ottawa, is the manager of the Simpson-Sears Ltd. at the Kingston Shopping Centre. He is a graduate of Commerce '39, who started his career in retail sales with the Hudson's Bay Company, taking time off to enlist in the army for 4½ years during World War II.

Mr. Eligh came to Kingston in 1969 as manager of the Sears store. During his years here he has participated in many activities, from chairing the 1972 Kingston campaign of the United Way, to being president of the local Chamber of Commerce. Currently Mr. Eligh is chairman of the board of St. Mary's of the Lake Hospital. In 1972 he was named Retailer of the Year and Man of the Year, in 1973 the local Y.M.C.A. acknowledged his contributions to their youth programme with a special award, and now he is the recipient of the Kingston Award.

Mr. Eligh received a certificate signed by the president of the Kingston Branch of the Alumni Association, and as well a maple tree is being donated in his name, to be planted in the fall between Jeffrey Hall and Agnes Etherington Art Centre.

Past recipients of this award include H.J. Hamilton, a retired director of alumni affairs at Queen's and ex-mayor E. Valorie Swain. Trees have been donated before as part of the award, although this is the choice of the recipient. A few years ago Mrs. Margaret Angus planted an oak tree, which stands outside Macintosh-Corry Hall.

More time less pay for nursing students

by Barb Conkie

In a recent bulletin Dr. H.C. Parrott, Minister of Colleges and Universities, proposed a number of recommendations aimed at strengthening the diploma nursing programme. The major issues outlined by Dr. Parrott are that the clinical portion of training be lengthened, stronger inter-hospital, college/university ties be established, and that the new graduate nurses be paid at a probationary rate for 3-6 months with possible on-the-job training in specialized areas.

Dr. Parrott's suggestions are mainly directed at community colleges, although his recommendations are based on a survey of all 42 nursing programs in Ontario. The recommendations arise from an eighteen-month study conducted by ARA Consultants Ltd. for the Ministry. Two thirds of the respondents expressed general satisfaction with training.

Mrs. Gay Greeves, Co-ordinator of Clinical Studies at St. Lawrence College, agreed with many of the bulletin proposals, yet felt that it did not provide any solid solutions. She explained that the proposed increase in clinical time from a 1200 hour minimum to a 1650 minimum would have little effect on the present 1552 clinical hours at St. Lawrence. Furthermore, Mrs. Greeves feels that an increase in total programme length could be accommodated, though she felt an increase of 20-22 to 23 months was a little vague and would prefer a specific number of hours.

As for hospital-college relationships, she stated that there has always been a certain amount of friction between the two. Mrs. Greeves explained that the college has a binding contract with the hospital in the form of an exchange of services: the hospital provides a learning experience for the students and the students provide a service in patient care for the hospital. She also felt that since the move in 1973 in which nursing schools were transferred to the colleges, there has been a further drift in communication which is largely based on increased physical distance between the two institutions.

Perhaps one of the most questionable issues is the proposed probationary pay period for the graduate nurse. The Dean of Nursing at Queen's, Miss A. Baumgart, agreed that graduates were not at their full potential after achieving graduate status, but she questioned the right to pay them a probationary rate. The Dean pointed out that no one considered paying a graduating engineer a probationary rate. Both Dean Baumgart and Mrs. Greeves hoped that with the increasing strength of the Nurses Union an appropriate arrangement would be reached.

Council plans Queen's future

The strategy Queen's should adopt to deal with the decade ahead is the theme of the annual meeting of the University Council, slated for Thursday evening and all day Friday, June 1-2, at the Donald Gordon Centre.

Queen's Principal Dr. Ronald L. Watts will give the keynote address at a dinner Thursday evening on the topic: Queen's faces the 80s - Managing with Less.

The Rt. Hon. Roland Michener, chancellor of Queen's will present this year's distinguished service awards to four "members of the Queen's family." Recipients are Agnes M. Benidickson, Russell J. Kennedy, Rev. Marshall Laverty, university chaplain since 1947, and the late Jean McGaughey.

New liquor law Sept. 1 raises legal age to 19

This fall, the provincial government will introduce legislation that will change many of Ontario's existing liquor laws. In some respects, the new laws will be tougher than the old ones - in other ways, they will be more lax.

Most noted among these is the proposed increase in the drinking age. As of Sept. 1, the legal drinking age will be raised to 19. The maximum penalty for illegal consumption of alcohol by minors will be increased to $10,000 (as compared to the existing maximum penalty of $2,000). In addition, it will become illegal to carry open bottles or glasses of liquor in public places.

Police will be given the authority to suspend drivers' licences for 24 hours if the blood-alcohol level of a driver is over .05. After 3 or more convictions for impaired driving, the driver's licence may be automatically suspended for 3 years.

A number of other changes will make things a little easier for the drinker. It will no longer be necessary to order a meal with a Sunday drink. Minors will be allowed to accompany their parents into licensed establishments in resort areas. Airlines will be permitted to serve alcoholic beverages outside of the hours which normally restrict the consumption of alcohol.

Larry Grossman, Minister of Consumer and Commercial Relations, stated that these changes will provide the "progressive measures the public wants with sufficient safeguards to prevent abuses."

Some university students will not be able to drink this September

Council should oppose faculty houses

Faculty houses have at last become an issue at Outer Council. And for good reason. The recent developments, specifically the attempt by the Commerce Society to obtain their own faculty house, could have a major long-term impact on this university, and it is about time that the A.M.S. examined the issue.

The report that came forward from the committee established to look at the question clearly demonstrates the neglect that this issue has received in the past. The section dealing with the possible effects on the university community, the most important section in the report, presented an inadequate discussion of the problem.

Look at the positive aspects of faculty houses as suggested in the report whose weaknesses were well pointed out by Paul Steep at the Council meeting: First it was proposed that a faculty house would provide a social meeting place for those students unfamiliar with Kingston. There can be no doubt that such a place would provide a social gathering place, but familiarity with Kingston would have nothing to do with the clientele. Students new to Kingston would be better served by going out into the community and learning about the city, than spending their time in another Queen's building.

Secondly, it was proposed that these houses could provide services unique to the university. Unfortunately, no such services were suggested in the report.

Thirdly, faculty houses would provide a meeting place for those with similar academic interests. This is exactly the problem. Faculties on this campus are already sufficiently isolated from each other. Any further contribution should certainly not be heralded as a positive contribution to life on this campus.

Fourthly, it was suggested that such houses could serve as an information centre, with relevant newspapers, magazines and trade books. This idea, while theoretically sound, appears to be unlikely to develop in practice. All the faculty houses now in existence serve as social centres only, and little reason has been given for this trend changing in the future. It is also not clear why these materials would not be better placed in the particular faculty society office, where they would be more readily accessible.

Faculty houses should be opposed for two reasons. No real benefits appear to be gained by their existence. And significant problems, both short and long-term, for the university community will develop.

First, this university already suffers from a student body sharply divided on faculty lines. This faculty spirit is instilled into the students right from their arrival on this campus, during orientation week, and continues to varying degrees throughout the academic careers of most students. Faculties tend to provide surrogate fraternities, and result in little cross-faculty communication. The members of each faculty identify closely with their respective faculty, at the cost of any serious exchange of viewpoints between faculties, except in such areas as Outer Council, where such exchange is required. Providing yet another "meeting place for those of similar academic interests" will do nothing towards solving this problem, and will probably only exacerbate it.

Secondly, for the first time in four years students next September will hopefully be faced with a fully operational University Centre. An entire generation of Queen's students have gone through this institution without the benefits that such a centre can provide, and there are probably few students left who remember what such a building can provide. After donating $600,000 towards the capital costs of this building, it is criminal to then endorse projects, such as faculty houses, which will draw students and activities away from this building.

The University Centre has one feature far more attractive than any faculty house; it is designed in the hopes of bringing the entire community closer together, in order to facilitate an exchange of information and opinion within the university as a whole. Such an exchange can do nothing but provide for a broader education than could otherwise be gained, and gaining an education is why students are here.

Fraternities were banned fifty years ago from this campus for their disruptive and sometimes fatal activities, as well as their elitist nature. Faculty houses are providing students with the new fraternities, without many of the questionable features, to be sure, but also without the one attractive feature. Fraternities provided for an exchange of opinions as members were drawn from every faculty and stage of education. Faculty houses will provide for no such exchange.

Faculty houses should be opposed by the A.M.S. and by every student concerned with the nature of student life here at Queen's. They will do nothing but provide fraternity-style social centres, but centres where there will be little cross-faculty exchange of ideas and information. They will serve to further divide this campus on faculty lines, creating, or helping to create, even less understanding between the faculties. They will also serve to impede the University Centre in its attempt to create a social centre where all elements of the university community can mix comfortably. Students have donated hundreds of thousands of dollars, and continue to each year, to the Centre to assist in the development of the building, and the efforts of students should be directed to make this concept work and not to undermining this effort.

Rothmans deals blow to tourney

by Mary Joy Aitken

It was announced last week that Rothmans of Pall Mall Canada Ltd., sponsors of the Canadian Open Tennis Tournament since 1970, will be withdrawing their sponsorship after the 1978 tournament.

This has been a severe blow to Tennis Canada, as it has been left without a sponsor for future Opens. Although Tennis Canada officials are confident that a new sponsor will be found, to date they have had little success.

The Canadian Open is the third oldest tennis tournament in the world after Wimbledon and the U.S. Open, with total prize money staked at $210,000, it is certainly one of the largest purses, as $175,000 goes to the men and $35,000 to the women.

Search for new host

But the prize money is only one part of the total cost of running a tournament the size of the Canadian Open. This year it has been estimated that the total cost of the Open will exceed $600,000. In the past Rothmans has put up approximately two-thirds of this amount.

The Canadian Open is not the only event in Canada which has lost sponsorship. Just last year Rothmans ended its sponsorship of a World Championship of Tennis (WCT) event held in Toronto each winter, as well as the Canadian summer circuit of tournaments.

One explanation Rothmans has given for this sudden withdrawal of financial backing is that with the increasing variety of cigarettes in demand their advertising dollars must be spread over a much broader market. Consequently, they do not have the dollars required for the sponsorship of major sporting events.

Stars will be losers

All of this puts Canada's nascent tennis program back at least one step, as it has lost an important financier of tennis in this country.

The Open is a major source of fund-raising for Tennis Canada, which subsequently puts most of these profits into developing young Canadian talent.

Thus the real losers of Rothmans' decision to pull out are the potential stars of Canadian tennis. Of course, one must not forget the public who enjoy watching the world's finest players.

The Canadian Open runs this year from August 14-20 at the Tennis Centre at York University in Toronto. Thus far Brian Gottfried and Eddie Dibbs, numbers five and six respectively in the world, have been signed for the tournament.

Limestone city gets green thumb

by Kathy Grant

Encouraged by the success of garden plots in Ottawa and elsewhere, the Energy Conservation Centre in Kingston decided to try to establish a small area of plots in the city this summer.

Initially, the Cataract Conservation Authority, St. Lawrence College, St. Mary's of the Lake Hospital, and the City Parks and Recreation office were contracted as possible sites for gardens.

It was then suggested by the city that a list of those interested in working a plot be compiled. As a result of this idea some 70 interested citizens applied.

The organization essentially involves assigning certain size plots to each interested gardener, collecting a few and helping to set up a committee from amongst the gardeners to run the show from year to year. To date, some 30 plots have been worked and many more are available.

It's a great outlet for those without yards who would like a little area to sit and watch things grow, and also exchange tips or the latest news with a fellow gardener.

So far there have been no major land disputes!

Evenings 389-6572 — 7582

by Colin Brown

I want to tell you about our party.

It was an affair which, judging by the amount of alcohol consumed and the numbers which attended, was a 'good time.' A windup to graduation weekend for a lot of people who I have lived or partied with for a long time. We had music, people weaving around on the street, some motorcycle riders straight out of 'Easy Rider,' and five squad cars full of Kingston's finest. Frontenac Street will never be the same.

Yet there is something disturbing about the whole business, and it is very difficult to explain what it was about Saturday night which disturbed me. Perhaps it was the horrible realization that I was the only person there who was going to make any sort of effort to keep the mayhem under control (horrible because I pay the bills) and when that revelation socked me at about ten o'clock there was a lot of mental and physical sobering up to do in a hurry. As Snoopy said when his daydreams of ecstasy swooned him clear off the top of his doghouse into an undignified belly-flop on the ground, 'Life is full of rude awakenings.'

Perhaps it was all those people I had never seen before in my house. There is something slightly unnerving about finding someone in your kitchen eating tomorrow's lunch or lurching into you in the hall and blurting out something about a 'bonfire' on the front lawn. The sight of twenty people on that balcony which wobbles with the gust of a fair-sized breeze never fails to inspire one's imagination as to the plot of Hollywood's next low-budget disaster epic.

It could have been the cops, but they were about the nicest bunch of guys we could have had for the ignoble task of requesting the removal of people and beer bottles from the street. They performed their job with candor and charm, so much that I got the feeling in talking to them that they disliked breaking things up just as much as we did. Yet Frontenac Street is an environment which does not take such events lightly, and the fact that the cops showed up with reinforcements the second time was adequate proof. There seems to be a wide variety of neighbours on Frontenac Street; everyone from the slap-happy students to the friendly family next door (who seem to enjoy our shenanigans) to those who peek out mysteriously from behind their drapes and call the police. Sometimes the chemistry of such an environment succeeds, and sometimes the peekers get the best of us.

Yet, aside from all these observations, there was something lying beneath it all which would not go away, nor will it for a long time. These are my friends who are graduating, and perhaps Saturday night was one of last chances I'll have to be with them after many years filled with some very special memories. I want to say this to them, but we all know that it is the kind of thing we'd rather not talk about.

And so the evening remains - wild, impetuous, numbed by the morning's dull reality, yet sadly climactic and a rude awakening to an emptier house.

Brador popularity due to higher alcohol content

by Terrence Reynolds

If anyone has recently sojourned in the Queen's Pub, they should have chanced upon a strange phenomenon. A new-fangled brew called Brador has adorned the majority of tables in the pub, since as seasoned alcoholics realize, you can get an extra 1.2 percent of spiritual confidence for the same price as regular beer. The real beauty of this new French beer is that in the past, it could be purchased only in Quebec (only in Quebec, you say? Pity).

Therefore, I feel that Molson's has made a fantastic humanitarian effort to increase national unity or to at least get our spirits up. This is the best contribution that Quebec has made to Canada since conscription was introduced in World War One and in both cases, it has lead to people getting blasted (rumour has it that Alberta was going to nationalize Tar Pits Ale, but apparently all is quiet on the western front). Also, the new brew has become firmly entrenched and will not be simply a last ditch attempt. The supreme effort by Queen's students to help advance cultural relations with Quebec by partaking in the national pastime of the province demonstrates that we really know what ales the country.

Unfortunately, the Stanley Cup series did nothing to further good relations, especially in the Toronto series, where the Leafs really got pucked.

The next series was even worse, because at the beginning of the game, the American anthem was played, followed by 'I'm a Canadian' and a couple of Harmonium hits. Also, as a tribute to the French players, Quebecois franchises of the Dairy Queen have changed the name of their famous ice cream bar to LaFleur Dilly, which could prove to be a hopeful sign, because it means the problem can be licked.

Why not Cheevers?

by Bill Wilder

The Habs did it again, for the twenty first time. Not bad for a team that is expected to win the Stanley Cup every fall. Besides winning this coveted reward, Ken Dryden won the Vezina Trophy, Guy Lafleur the scoring championship and on a questionable decision, Larry Robinson took the Conn Smythe Trophy. I am not taking anything away from the big fellow, but I thought Gerry Cheevers played the best hockey of his career.

Gerry Cheevers is thirty-eight years of age, playing goal with battered knees. Yet he is the main reason why his team made the finals and he took two games from the Habs. He also shut out the Habs in the third game of the series. Countless times Cheevers robbed the Canadians of sure goals by coming out of his net and challenging all comers.

However, one must play better than did Cheevers to win the Conn Smythe even when the deck is stacked against you. The Canadiens took first place, then they sew up both the goaltending and scoring championships. They win the Stanley Cup and may have winners for either the Hart Trophy or Norris Trophy, if not both. The decision makers select yet another Canadian to win the Smythe Trophy. It is sad to think that only the Canadiens have the hockey player with the calibre to win one of these trophies. It is even sadder to think that Cheevers will never play that way again with his age and knees against him. Maybe one of Cheever's horses will win the Queen's plate.

Renaissance: reborn

by Paul Seay

During February of this year, Renaissance released their newest album entitled "A Song For All Seasons." "A Song For All Seasons" is their most refined to date considering the blend between the orchestral arrangements and the main instruments of the band.

There are two types of Renaissance fans: the "old" and the "new" those that like their earlier albums and those that like their new releases, namely "Novella" and "A Song For All Seasons". Both these albums were released after their successful tour of North America, in 1975, from which they released their "Live" album.

To the "old" fans, the "Live" album signified the end of the early Renaissance musical period. This was augmented by the presentation of "Novella", and an entirely different sound since it was more electronic than the four preceding studio albums. Although "Novella" is a good album musically, it seems to have lost the original Renaissance "punch" evident in the first four studio albums.

However, with the release of the new album, Renaissance appears to have eliminated the split between their fans. The new album was produced by David Hentschel, a former producer for Genesis. Usually, Renaissance produces its own albums with Dick Plant, but Hentschel seems to have made the band return to the earlier sounds of the group. Basically, the "A Song For All Seasons" tries to capture the mood of the four seasons of the year by varying the selections of music. Appropriately enough, side one begins with a song called "Opening Out" which beautifully blends the orchestration of the main instruments with Annie Haslam's clear voice. This song sounds much like an overture, with the intent of leading into "Day of the Dreamer", the best song of the album since it is typically long, allowing the band to pursue two main melodies in the song. Again, the listener is allowed to enjoy the blend between orchestra and band, with the orchestra replying to the melodies the band creates in the song.

Ending side one is a moving song sung by the bassist, Jon Camp. Camp often accompanies Haslam on vocals, but rarely sings an entire song by himself.

Side two begins with a different, more commercial sound. The second cut is very soft and has Camp singing once again, which leads into "Northern Lights", the "hit" song of the album. "Northern Lights" combines the Renaissance qualities of crescendos, classical-rock and female vocals into another exhilarating piece of music. This is followed by the title track, "A Song for All Seasons". As with two of their older albums, Renaissance has geared the entire album to the title track, thus making it the most powerful song on the album.

With this combination of musical selections, it is hard to say that the new album is not their best album.

Renaissance will be in concert at Massey Hall in Toronto on June 16. If you are unfamiliar with the music of Renaissance, try to see them live. If this is not possible, don't be afraid to buy "A Song For All Seasons"; you will not be disappointed.

by L. Nightingale

The first weekend of convocation is over now, but there will be more this coming week. Many parents will be there to proudly watch their sons/daughters graduate into the great world that exists out there someplace. The consequence of this is that the motels and hotels are all booked up and the restaurants will be filled to capacity all day long. Even with a reservation you may find yourself waiting in a crowded noisy restaurant, the place you want to be with your family and friends on such a special day!

As an alternative why not put together a picnic and really enjoy the beautiful weather. After the boring claustrophobia of Jock Hartly Arena you and your family deserve a lazy laid-back outing. With cheese from Cookes, cold meat and breads from John's Deli, and fresh fruit from Quattrochi's, you can have a summertime feast, and spend a lot less than you would at the Firehall or Dr. Bull's. (Don't forget some wine too!)

The following are suggestions for that perfect picnic spot.

1. Lemoine Point. Drive straight out King St. West, past Days Rd. and you'll come to this conservation area on the lake, built on the old Lemoine estate. About 7 miles.

2. Kingston Mills. Straight out Hwy No. 15 (towards Ottawa), then just past the 401, turn left at Codes corners, its about a mile further. Built around the beautiful old Rideau Locks, this park is a small, but quite uncrowded this time of year. This is where I came with my mother and sisters when I first graduated. One advantage is that the water in the locks is warm enough for swimming. About 8 miles.

3. Bell Island. This little known spot offers the utmost in privacy. Drive out Montreal St. and turn into the City golf course; follow the dirt road on the right which winds across this golf course. Cross the wee bridge and you are on Bell Island, accessible only by boat until only a few years ago. Three miles.

4. Fort Henry. From the side of the hill, below the fort, you can look out over the water and down onto the rooftops and steeples of Kingston. A great view but not too comfortable. Still a good place to take parents from Don Mills 2 miles.

Finally if your parents really would prefer a restaurant meal, consider the pleasant eighteen mile drive to Gananoque. I guarantee that the Golden Apple Inn and the Atholone are easily the match of any Kingston restaurant. Reservations are recommended for large parties. If you are adventurous and have lots of time, try Cavellero's the pride of Alexandria Bay, New York. Its about thirty-five miles from downtown Kingston.

Have a good day. We can all talk about it at the UJC office next week.

Straight Time not a good time

by Tim Greenwood

When a movie emerging from the plastic world of Hollywood sets out to portray with some degree of honesty the darker side of American life it is with reluctance one judges it as a failure. Despite its pretensions toward honesty however, there is something disturbingly dishonest about Straight Time's depiction of the injustice of the American parole system. The dishonesty and unevenness of the film lies in its truthfulness and its failure to be either.

For most viewers Dustin Hoffman in the title role brings associations from his former roles as an ex-con. The nervous energy and bumbling boyish charm he brought to his earlier movies is apparent in the early going of the movie as he plays a little man trying to find his place in society after his release from prison. The film appears initially as if it might succeed on Hoffman's charm, but it suddenly takes a violent turn as Hoffman's ex-callous system, explodes back into his world of violence and crime. Given the degradation he has suffered this lightning swift transformation from little man to violent criminal is perhaps conceivable, but an audience accustomed to only this actor's lighter side is unprepared for the sudden violence of his darker side.

An unconvincing love relationship for Hoffman further hampers the movie's aspiration toward honesty, for it seems a rather gratuitous cowering to Hollywood formula.

Despite the film's ultimate failure as either entertainment or as a document of injustice, there are sequences which provide insight into the demeaning world of the ex-con. In an early sequence, Hoffman, struggling to be humble before an officious and arbitrary parole officer, tells him all he wants is a job, a place to live, and someone to love him. The film then systematically goes about showing how the 'system' goes about thwarting even these humble aspirations. The only sort of job he is able to get is a mind-numbing and deafening one in a canning plant. Then the sanctity of his first home is totally ignored by his parole officer who walks in for a routine check while Hoffman is out. Finally his dignity is compromised and a date with his girl-to-be is disrupted, when his parole officer sends him back to jail on a slight suspicion.

Ultimately Straight Time fails because Hoffman as its title character strips off his humanity like a snake sheds its skin. This might be the logical consequence of the inhuman system the character encounters yet this movie lacks the single-mindedness necessary for a convincing story.

The Editor,

On Monday May 15, the American Senate finally voted in favour of President Carter's plane sale package after prolonged debate and controversy. When the news arrived in Israel, the government was said to be "disturbed". Mr. Begin commented that the sales would make it difficult for Israel to withdraw from the Sinai. Senator Church, an outspoken opponent of the sales, said that arms to Egypt and Saudi Arabia would only harden the negotiating position of the Israelis because they felt that their security was threatened.

Despite repeated assurance by Saudi Arabian Prince Fahd that the 60 F-15's would not be placed in air bases near Israel, that the planes would only be used for defensive purposes, and that they would not be transferred to another Arab state, the Israeli government has said that such restraints on use were unreliable and could not be trusted. Such reactions have illustrated once again the die-hard intransigence of the government and its concept of a dictated peace. If the sales of planes to the Arab states would toughen the position of Israel, and if Senator Church was really so interested in peace, would he then also block the 110 combat aircrafts to Israel for fear that they would toughen the Arab states? Israel was right in saying that restraints on use that accompanied arm sales could not be trusted. She knew better than anyone else because despite previous commitment to the U.S., the lethal cluster bombs were used for the killing of Lebanese during the invasion of Lebanon.

The plan sales represent a change in attitude in the U.S. Despite the vocal and influential Jewish lobby, the Administration is now taking a more pragmatic policy in the Middle East which includes support for moderate Arab states in exchange for influence in the area.

The Israelis, I believe, must now recognize a few facts, however painful the process may be. First of all, peace in the Middle East can be sustained not by military supremacy but by mutual trusts (or more realistically, by mutual interests). Israel, whether or not she admits, needs peace more than ever because of the numerous domestic problems that she faces. So do a number of other Arab states.

Secondly, the era of unquestioning support for Israel in the U.S. has passed. More so, the once feverish adoration of the Israeli solidarity and bravery is eroding in the rest of the world. People are getting tired of the emotional appeal from Israel especially after the invasion of Lebanon, the futile peace initiative of Sadat and the recent brutal attack on an Arab high school by Israeli forces on the West Bank.

Finally, if Mr. Begin kept on delaying a peace agreement, his successors might find it an increasingly difficult task to fulfil if it were to comply with his interpretation of "Israeli security".

Conflict spurs resignation

Penny Chapman, owner of Fakhrona Arabian Stables, fondles one of this year's foals.

by Staff

Dave Court, co-director of Job Bank, has submitted his resignation to the AMS in the middle of his term, citing a personality conflict with his fellow director, John Koopman, Vice President of Operations told the Journal.

Court had made a "commitment" when he accepted the position, said Koopman. He noted, however, the "lion's share" of the organizational and promotional work behind Job Bank had been done in March and April, before the director's duties had officially begun. Court's organizational abilities had been a major reason for his appointment, Koopman observed.

Court's replacement is now being sought from amongst those who made applications for the job in February with the possibility of the position being filled through Job Bank itself. Koopman stated. According to QSA director Sheila Murray the position had been filled as of this weekend but Koopman said the particular individual chosen unfortunately had a prior job commitment. Koopman refused to release the name of the individual.

"Job Bank pretty well runs itself now," Koopman stated. The type of person now being sought is a "people person, someone who can stay there all day and keep a good humour," said Koopman.

Dave Court now has a position with the University as a student coordinator of summer conferences.

"We are shocked"

cries Edelson over gov't decision to bar student vote

[Special] - "We are shocked. The Government, in an extraordinary move, has rejected its own advisory committee recommendation and decided to bar students from voting representation on college boards of governors."

This was the reaction of Miriam Edelson, Chairperson of the 170,000 member Ontario Federation of Students, to the government's decision revealed yesterday, not to allow voting students on any of Ontario's 22 community college boards.

"The Council of Regents, after receiving numerous briefs from students and the college boards themselves, and after months of discussion, finally agreed to recommend voting student representation in July of 1977. The Cabinet's unusual move in rejecting this considered decision is inexplicable."

"Students have been sitting on university boards for years now. Does the government somehow consider college students less responsible, less competent, less able, to sit on governing boards?"

"The college system has been in existence for over 10 years. It is simply unbelievable that those most affected by board decisions—the faculty, staff and students in the colleges have been, and now will continue to be, excluded from the decision-making process."

In a letter to the Minister, Dr. Parrott, this afternoon, Ms. Edelson has asked that a meeting be held between Federation representatives and the Minister as soon as possible to discuss the Cabinet decision.

Cheaper loans thwarted by Queen's bank lease

Staff

It is unlikely the AMS will support an OFS-sponsored student credit union currently in the planning stages. The credit union would provide students with low-cost loans.

The establishment of a credit union is one of the major proposals to be discussed at the June 7-11 OFS annual meeting in Guelph. A prescription drug plan is also included on the agenda. Both ideas are part of an OFS move to expand into the service sector.

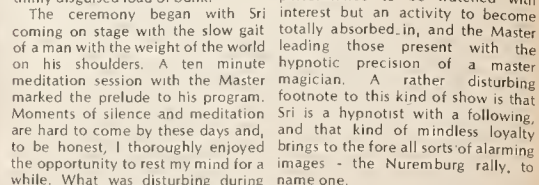

At last Tuesday's Summer Council meeting, some members expressed concern that the political and service functions of the OFS would not be kept separate. They feared this might result in a conflict in attaining the two distinct goals of money-making and policy-making.

"I wouldn't want to trust the OFS with my money," said one council member.

The credit union plan would not be feasible at Queen's because of the exclusive 15-year bank contract currently held by the campus branch of Bank of Montreal.

The AMS delegation to the meeting will also present policy papers on the problems of late OSAP cheques, student unemployment and financial cutbacks to universities.

Who's Where

by I.W. Jones

A new Chrysalis re-reading of interest is Glider, the first album by the New York jazz ensemble Auracle. This six member group is young by jazz standards, ranging in age from 22-24 years old, however they are not merely a high school group breaking the jazz market. They met and formed at the Eastman School of Music where they were studying and as well have had extensive experience with various jazz ensembles and orchestras on a personal basis. As a group, they represent a return to a truer sound in their recordings. There are no unnecessary over-dubs leaving their music surprisingly fresh and clear. Shortly after forming, they performed at the 1975 Notre Dame Jazz Festival and easily won the small group category as well as three individual awards. John Serry was awarded as best pianist as well as receiving the award for best arranger/composer while fellow member Steve Kujala was recognized for his abilities on flute. Among the judges were the likes of Hubert Laws and Sonny Rollins and fellow judge and critic Dan Morgenstern said Auracle was the best band he's seen in 12 years.

In the three years since then, Auracle has been performing at various jazz festivals throughout the States before producer Tom Meehan, producer of Miles Davis for many years, recognized Auracle's potential and agreed to produce the album for Chrysalis. The album has eight cuts, each a standout, characterized by an awareness of what each instrument is capable of within the framework of each composition giving each a clear uncrowded sound. Their jazz is unique in its use of their classical influences as well as energetic in the sense of good rock. A combination not easily controlled, yet brought off with ease by Auracle. In short Auracle's album Glider is easily the best new jazz album this year and a certain addition to any library.

A new sound in rock is Kate Bush with her new, and first, album The Kick Inside on Harvest Records. Discovered by a rumour of Pink Floyd, this nineteen year old from Britain demonstrates a chilling insight in her writing coupled with an intriguing voice. She is of the rare rock artists who is not afraid to experiment with her voice to get the most out of it and the result she can at one moment be very haunting and at the next moment very liquid in tone. Her voice can be piercing and raspy or soft and melodic as she demonstrates in the four ballads she performs on the album. An intriguing artist with a long way to go. The only warning is that if you are used to very smooth voices you may be in for a pleasant or very disturbing surprise.

OOT & ABOOT IN KINGSTON

by L. Nightingale

This caper takes a bit of daring - just a bit - but pays off in excitement. It's also illegal, but there is not much chance of getting caught, and even less of being arrested.

What is this mysterious activity? Breaking into old deserted farmhouses on Wolfe Island. There are lots of them. Many haven't been lived in for twenty or thirty years, maybe longer. Why do it? You'll understand once you get inside. The feeling is indescribable. You become a time traveller as you stand surrounded by the debris - the last remains of an earlier era gone forever. You'll find all the trappings of the rural Ontario social mosaic: ovens, Silverwood's and barber shop calendars, faded mauve flowered linoleum, milk-of-magnesia bottles, Prince Albert Tobacco tins, the Star Weekly, Dionne Quintuplets memorabilia.

Often these houses don't seem to have been touched since the day they were boarded up. Dust and mouse (rat?) droppings are everywhere and there is both a stillness and staleness, as though the very air was locked into the house the day it was deserted and has sat there ever since.

Now that you've got the feeling, you'll start searching for treasures to take home. You needn't have any qualms about this - this stuff is garbage, right? It was abandoned thirty years ago. Nobody wants it - Except you and me.

Chances are you won't find much downstairs in the main part of the house. The attic is where you want to look. Up there, although you may need a flashlight, you'll find very trippy old clothes that usually aren't salvagable, but you never know. Keep looking and you'll find crockery and silverware — how about a decorated lead spoon from the Queen's coronation? (I once found a Shirley Temple twenty-first birthday album.) Old newspapers and magazines are great finds, as are Christmas cards, children's report cards, and personal letters. Sure, you feel like a snoop, an eavesdropper on the past, and even though you may be half a mile from the nearest farm, you'll probably be whispering all the time. It is as though you are in a museum, or even mausoleum; there's something about these old frame houses that deserve your respect.

Don't mess the place up. You mustn't be irreverent. Try to leave the place the way you found it, and certainly don't leave any wine bottles or candy bar wrappers because they'll just confuse the next visitors twenty years from now. We need to show a little respect for our national monuments right?

Convocation-for what?

by Stephen Zimmer

Convocation has come and gone. For some, this represents the end of years of learning. For others, it is the beginning. This is the time of year when university students are told to go out and put the results of their education to use.

However, this is also the time of year when the cynics begin to surface. These are the people who question the validity of the university degree. Why waste three or four years of your life and thousands of dollars for the sake of a piece of parchment? (The money isn't really that important, though - the cynics have informed us that our wealthy parents can easily afford the expense of an education that they, no doubt, are paying for). Such people take delight in destroying any feeling of accomplishment that the university graduate may have gained. The Queen's graduate, we are told, is merely the product of a citadel of conservatism. An "academic cloister", if you will.

Cynics and prophets of doom are growing in numbers, especially where the university is concerned. In this time of government cutbacks and unemployment, it's easy to be cynical and negativistic. This feeling of negativism is so deep-set that the university government goes as far as inviting guest speakers who tell the students that they are wasting their time - time that could be put to better use elsewhere. (Two cases in point - Caroline Bird and the "self-proclaimed university critic", Laurier La Pierre).

Obviously, it's unhealthy to adopt a "Polyanna" attitude - that the future is rosy and that all things will work out on their own. However, one must distinguish between negativism and realism. The graduate is already aware of the potential problems that may face him. The road that leads to their solution may be marked with difficulty. But the journey is not made any easier by the cynics who lie in wait along the way.

Letter does not present convincing case

In their letter below Dave Court and Terry Wright make some comments that cannot go unanswered.

The proposed Commerce House will provide services that at present do not exist on campus, according to the authors. Yet if one looks at the proposed services, one will notice that, with the exception of the meeting room with stereo music, all the facilities already exist on campus. It is for this reason that the Specific proposals of the Commerce Society were ignored, not for reason of any ignorance of them on the part of the author of the editorial.

There are also three other reasons. First, the proposed services will also not be located on campus as the house will not be located on campus. Secondly, the authors do not present any reasons why rooms in the University Centre could not or should not be converted to these purposes.

Thirdly, previous faculty house proposals have made the same suggestions, and none to date have been successful in executing them. It is questionable whether the proposal of the Commerce Society will alleviate this problem.

The general aims of the Commerce Society are not in question. But there is no reason yet presented which is sufficient to accept the concept of faculty houses, and there is good reason to focus on the negative aspects. Even if the Commerce Society is capable of overcoming the divisive aspects of their house and provide a general service to the university community, such a building will inevitably end up in competition with the University Centre for the leisure hours of Queen's students.

Faculty houses should still be opposed, at least until better argumentation can be presented on their behalf.

Cabinet bars representation

Dr. H. Parrott toured the province this past academic year claiming that he wished to entertain a dialogue with post-secondary students in Ontario, but a recent Ontario cabinet decision seems to belie this.

The Ontario Cabinet has decided to continue barring students from voting representation on college boards of governors. The decision was made contrary to the recommendation of the Council of Regents, the provincial governing body for Ontario community colleges, which recommended in July of 1977 that such representation should be allowed.

However, this decision not only affects students, but continues to bar faculty and staff representation as well.

Universities have had such representation on their governing boards for a number of years. The question raised by Miriam Edelson, Chairperson of the Ontario Federation of Students, needs to be answered: "Does the government somehow consider college students less responsible, less competent, less able, to sit on governing boards?"

We are waiting for the answer.

Letters

Court presents case for Commerce House

Dear Editor:

The purpose of this letter is to provide a different perspective on the issue of faculty houses as outlined in the May 30 editorial "Council should oppose faculty houses".

We hope to do this in two ways. First, we wish to show that the dangers of faculty houses as presented in the editorial are surmountable, and secondly, to show that a faculty house, if designed properly, as we believe the Commerce proposal is, would be a valuable addition to the University community. If this letter seems to be slanted solely from the perspective of a Commerce house, we apologize, but hope you will understand.

The first argument presented in the editorial was that faculty houses would impede the use of the University Centre by Queen's students. To be sure, there are many benefits from the University Centre now that it is full and operational. However, this does not necessarily mean that a Faculty house will compete with the University Centre. Indeed, the Commerce proposal was never intended to compete in any way with the University Centre.

There is a great potential for supplementary services that are needed on campus. Proper co-ordination between the groups involved would ensure that any problems could be avoided. The Commerce proposal calls for the Vice-President (Operations) and the Education Commissioner of the AMS, as well as the Dean of the Business School and a member of the University Centre Programming Committee to sit on the Board of Directors of the house. Surely people such as these can insure that a duplication of services does not take place.

Further more, it is important to note that the University Centre is already filled close to capacity for office space. If the Commerce Society were to take office space in the University Centre, it could well be at the expense of groups who use the Centre on a temporary basis. The type of groups who used the Centre on such a basis in the past week include the Kingston Community Players, the Handicapped Adults, and the Ban Righ Foundation for Continuing Education.

The second issue cited was that all faculty houses will become, to quote the Editor, "fraternity-style social centres". This point we find particularly hard to swallow, especially considering that the Editor seems to have no idea of the plans for such a house. For four months now, a report has been available outlining the plans for a house which would ensure that the house did not become a "fraternity style social centre", yet we have had no requests for information. If the author has concerns that is fine. However, making vague generalizations about a house without bothering to find out what is planned is unbecoming of the high quality of journalism we are used to.

The purpose of our house is not to have solely students in burgundy jackets sitting around drinking in the basement of a house. The Commerce Society, in recent years has adopted a policy of increasing cross-faculty exchanges of ideas. Such things as running social events like Omm-Pa-Pa with other faculties, hosting a conference with invited delegates from other faculties as well as other universities across Canada, and most recently a move to help co-ordinate an improved campus-wide United Way Campaign involving all faculties are examples of this policy.

Our plans for a house are nothing more than a natural extension of this policy. The house is not intended to be a "Commerce House" for just Commerce students, but rather it is to be a centre on campus in which Commerce students, understandingly interested in gaining some practical organizing experience, can run something, not outside the university, but for the university. Such a house will involve two basic features. First it will provide services which we feel are not currently available on campus. Examples of these services are a meeting room with stereo music which will provide students with a more intimate meeting place than is available on campus, a T.V. room available to everyone, ping-pong tables and possibly a small laundry mat for students.

In addition, it will provide office space for the Commerce Society, a society which despite trying to serve the university through conferences, community services and three publications, is forced to work out of a 12 foot by 6 foot office and run a newspaper out of a student's kitchen. Given such needs and a willingness to only supplement and not inhibit existing student services, we hope you can sympathize with some exasperation we feel when people will look only at the negative sides of faculty houses and are not willing to consider what a valuable addition such a house could be to the Queen's community.

It is understandable that people are somewhat apprehensive about what faculty houses, in the worst circumstances, could become. However, this simply is not going to happen with the house as proposed by the Commerce Society. Furthermore, we are, and always have been, open to any guidelines that the students of Queen's feel are necessary to prevent your concerns from becoming realities. We therefore propose two things. First, that Outer Council look at faculty houses on an individual basis to ensure that each house is not detrimental to the university community. We are sure they will find our proposal to be a pleasant addition to the university community.

Secondly, that Council, or anyone for that matter, who feels there are certain requirements necessary to prevent the house from becoming a detriment, suggest them and they will be incorporated into the by-laws of the house and passed by council as such. Having non-Commerce students on the Board of Directors, having an open door policy and running events which are specifically meant to bring about the cross-faculty exchange that the editor was so concerned about are examples of what can be done. I can only repeat that we are open to any other suggestions that council feels are necessary.

We have pride in the steps that the Commerce Society has taken in recent years to become more involved in the university community as a whole. We realize that we have more work to be done but we feel that a house providing needed services for the university is an important step to take. We urge council not to stop a house because of what past faculty houses have done, but work together with us to make the house the addition to the university community it can become.

President
Terry Wright,
Vice President,
Commerce Society.

QUEEN'S UNIVERSITY, KINGSTON, ONTARIO

Over 100 athletes like the ones pictured above participated in this past weekend's Eastern Ontario Games for the Physically Disabled. Due to the increased number of entrants this year, qualifying standards had to be set.

The best of this group will be able to attend the provincial games to be held next month in Windsor.

OFS prepares to fight cutbacks

— Special to the Journal

A coordinated anti-cutbacks strategy, which will include, "organized mass action in the fall", was established at the OFS plenary held in Guelph this past weekend. The focus of the strategy is to educate the students, making them aware of the effects of cutbacks on university campuses. In addition it will seek to strengthen ties with organized labour, the OSSTF and other community groups. Co-ordination with the NUS campaign against cutbacks was also planned. "We noticed a greater sense of solidarity on policy issues at this conference than in past years", said the Queen's delegation.

Several committees dealing with issues including, unemployment, student services, NUS/OFS sponsored credit union. It was discovered that most campuses have the same restrictive contractual arrangements with existing banks as does Queen's, prohibiting duplication of services.

Strategy for supporting the reimplementation of Ontario's rent review was examined. The OFS feels rent review should be renewed when it expires this summer. A research and publicity campaign to inform students of the specific problems faced by foreign students, such as differential fees and visa regulations, is also planned.

Queen's delegates elected to OFS positions were: Gord Howe, Journal editor, to the position of OFS treasurer, Rory Cattanaohc, Vice President of Operations, to the

Tuition fees may rise again this fall, according to the OFS (Ontario Federation of Students).

At its recent plenary in Guelph, it was agreed that a policy statement should be prepared for the possible announcement by Harry Parrot, Minister of Colleges and Universities, of increased tuition.

It is not known at this time how large the increase may be, but OFS plans to fight any increase.

Handicapped games bring out the best

by Becky Boyce

It may have had to compete with Folklore '78 this past weekend, but the Eastern Ontario Games for the Physically Disabled was an event that neither lacked in numbers nor enthusiasm.

Being open to athletes who suffer from disabilities, the athletic events officially commenced early on Saturday morning at the YM-YWCA where the pool and game events were to take place. The games were completed with Track and Field events held on Sunday at Richardson Stadium. This year, over 100 athletes participated in the games, and if you were one of those who attended any of the events, you may have found yourself viewing some high-calibre performance in any of the areas.

Due to the increasing number of participants each year, the format of this year's regional games has changed slightly over that of the previous 2 years. In the past, an open door policy served as the standard for competitive entry in the Ontario games. But, this year, qualifying standards have been set up and the games provide a selection method for athletes who attend the provincial games in Windsor next month.

Annabelle Twiddy, one of the volunteer coordinators of the Eastern Ontario games, explained some of the effects of such a change. She said the regional games are now the only level at which people can come to the event just to participate.

"The new selection policy has forced us to have many, many more events than were offered in previous years. This ensures that people receive a change to qualify themselves in any of the events offered at the provincial level."

"We've had to marry the social function of the games with the fact that this is an official meet," she said. Stacey Merritt, another volunteer, who coordinated both the athletic and social events of the weekend, emphasized the social aspect of the gathering. He felt that the majority of participants "weren't serious athletes" and that "most had come down to meet other people and try things out." The group, who were housed in Victoria Hall at Queen's University, had the opportunity to attend such functions as a wine and cheese get-together Friday night, a disco-dance on Saturday, and an awards banquet which followed the track events on Sunday.

All of the people involved in the weekend expressed their delight in the support which the games had received from all sectors of the community. Ms. Twiddy said that the games benefited from the cooperation shown by the University Physical Education Department, the Physical Plant, Victoria Hall and the YM-YWCA. She felt that the disabled games were an "extremely interesting phenomenon".

"People dwell more on their disabilities than abilities I guess," and she suggested that the games provide an educational experience for the spectators/volunteers as well as the participants. Pat Larry, the meet-official at Richardson Stadium, said "People who hadn't worked in a function such as this before learned something today."

Campus Comment

by Steve Zimmer

This week, Campus Comment asked for opinions concerning the Queen's Quest. Individuals were asked if they felt that this was an acceptable means of raising funds for the university. If not, then they were asked to suggest other alternatives.

Pam Carson, Arts 80

Pam agreed with the idea of asking for contributions from people who are directly involved with the university. She was not sure about requesting donations from those who are not associated with Queen's

Cathy Kearns, Arts 80

Regarding the fact that students will be contributing money to Queen's Quest as part of their interest fees, Cathy said, "I think it should be a person's own choice. They should have the option whether it should be deducted or not." Cathy believed that it was acceptable for the university to ask for donations through the mail as long as people were not asked repetitively Queen's Computer Center continues to expand with its recent move to the bottom of Jeffrey Hall.

Karl Dilcher, Graduate Student, Math

Since the majority of students voted in favour of donating to the Quest, Karl felt that such donations were justified. Karl also agreed with asking private businesses for money, as this may serve to increase the standard of education. Business profits from the fact that the increased standards of education may provide better-educated employees.

M. Kalin, Department of Geological Sciences

"I think that it's a somewhat difficult time at the moment for universities. That sort of action, I think, is justified. But it's basically not desirable." Mr. Kalin stated that the universities have an "ancient tradition" of providing a service to the community and that the "economic integration" is a recent phenomenon. In the capitalist system, we expect a profit from an investment. The people want to know what they're getting in return for their investment in the university. If the public does not appreciate the other contributions made by the university, then this may lead to conflicts.

Mr. Kalin believed that Queen's Quest was a suitable short-term solution to financial problems. However, it does not provide an overall solution to the university's monetary difficulties.

World Cup Soccer fan support high as surprises unfold

By Bill Wilder

The winter sports, if I may call them that, finally ended on the night of June seventh. The Washington Bullets won the NBA crown by defeating the surprising Seattle Supersonics in the seventh and final game of the championship series.

With Canadian Football still in training camp, American Football yet to start and baseball in only its third month, the only events remaining were the Belmont stakes and soccer's World Cup final. While not taking anything away from Affirmed and Steve Cautchen, I think most sports fans are anxiously watching soccer's best. Some commentators estimate the World Cup will have the largest ever worldwide television audience for a sporting event.

For the first time the World Cup is being held in South America. Argentina is putting on the show at considerable cost and with tight security. The country is run by a military junta which overthrew Isabel Perone a few years ago. By sponsoring the 1978 World Cup this military junta is attempting to show the world that they have done an acceptable job governing the country. Unfortunately, the government failed to consider that sponsoring such an extravaganza may bankrupt an already sagging economy.

Unfortunately, Canada is not in the finals but they came very close. They lost a game to San Salvador in 1977 which they should have won.

A handful of great teams are competing in the World Cup. Defending champion, West Germany, is the early favorite, but they are without star midfielder, Franz Beckenbauer and striker, Gerd Mueller. West Germany displayed their power by humiliating Mexico 6-0 after opening the tournament with a lacklustre 0-0 draw against Poland.

Argentina, the host country, has also fielded a good side. They won their opening game 2-1 against Hungary in a hard fought match. Italy, Brazil and Holland have strong teams and should provide good competition.

If there has been a disappointment thus far, it has been the Scottish team. They opened the tournament with a flat performance and subsequently lost 3-1 to Peru. And the troubles didn't end there. Scottish forward, Willie Johnston admitted taking a banned drug before the match against Peru. As a result he has been expelled from the tournament by the FIFA (the International Football Federation). Scotland hopes were further dampened when they were held to a 1-1 draw against lowly Iran.

The surprise team thus far has to be Austria. They opened against Spain and upset them 2-1. Then they repeated with another 1-0 upset over Sweden.

No team is expected to waltz to the crown as the Montreal Canadians did in the Stanley Cup. A World Cup soccer champion has to be a combination of total team effort and great skill.

DOUG MCARTHUR June 15 to 17 169A PRINCESS ST. $3.

by Colin Brown

I spent last weekend in the province of Quebec, and came away with a rather bitter taste in my mouth.

It had nothing to do with the weekend itself; there was the swimming, sailing and partying which the Laurentian cottage areas seem to provide so well. Yet there was something present throughout the journey which seemed to continually jab at the consciousness of this very "waspy" English Canadian; they're changing the signs in Quebec. Thanks to Bill 101, Quebecers are scrambling to obliterate any English language phrases or directions from any sign in the province. You see it in the bars, in the stores, and on the highways. It's almost as if the P.Q. government is trying to ignore the English language completely, and by doing so hoping their problems may disappear into thin air.

The deadline for eliminating English signs is July 1st, but the job seems to be almost done. A large slab of green paint covers the word "downtown" on the Decarie Boulevard sign in Montreal. On the Laurentian Autoroute a notoriously steep hill which used to warn truckers in both languages to slow down, use a lower gear and check their brakes now only reads, "Testez vos freins."

Pity the "English-only" driver, unfamiliar with the road, whose rig cists the top of that hill one night and sails down a two mile twisting slope. But let's get back to the weekend. Saturday was clear and cool, and I took the opportunity to climb to the top of Mt. Tremblant. The climb was not a tough one as I stuck to the ski trails, but it took about an hour to reach the summit, and I was quite frightened when I got there. Upon reaching the top, I was greeted by a view which I could spend days describing: let us say it was simply magnificent.

However, no sooner had I arrived than I heard the sound of radios and excited chatter from the direction of the north slope, and soon I was joined by a band of French-Canadian C.B. enthusiasts lugging a 40 ft. boom antenna, power boosters, backpacks and transmitters. Their english wasn't so good and my pigeon french caused a few giggles in their ranks, but soon we fell into lengthy and rambling conversations which only C.B. enthusiasts can. We rigged up their monstrous antenna (I had thought I had been "hefty" lugging a 35mm camera up the mountain) and soon were jabbering away (in French and English) into the microphone trying to reach people in Ottawa and Montreal. This exercise was carrying on to little or no avail when I saw that it was time to return to the village, so I said good-bye to my new friends and started back down the mountain.

Driving home on Sunday the signs were there again: blunt, chilling and somewhat frightening. Yet they were saddening as well, for I kept thinking of my brief encounter on top of the mountain and how senseless these jarring examples of a bitter conflict seemed when matched against a few friendly people who found they had a lot in common.

Putting your best feet forward

Selecting the proper shoes is crucial

The selection today is greater than ever

by Stephen Zimmer

The popularity of jogging has shown a tremendous increase over the past few years, as thousands of people are taking to the streets to reap the many benefits that the sport has to offer. Road running has grown in almost epidemic proportions. For example, in 1968, 600 runners were entered in the grueling Boston Marathon. In 1976 the figure leapt to 2,180. This year, over 6000 competitors took part in the race.

By now, you may have decided to join the many other "pavement pounders". But before you do, there are two important things that you must first consider - namely, your feet. The feet must surely be wonders of anatomical engineering. After all, they've got a heavy burden to carry and are subject to a great deal of punishment. When you're running, each foot hits the ground approximately 800 times per mile. Consider then, the pounding that the feet are exposed to during a typical five-mile run on a solid asphalt or concrete surface. And most of the stress is borne by the heel, which is usually the first part of the foot to come into contact with the ground.

Therefore, it is imperative that the feet be given adequate protection and cushioning. Unless you're someone like Abebe Bikila (who won the 1960 Olympic marathon in his bare feet), this means investing your money in a good pair of shoes. Your shoes should provide protection, cushioning, support, comfort, and traction. Flexibility is also a virtue in a running shoe. Although the sole of the shoe should be rigid from the heel to the back of the ball of the foot, it must be flexible from the ball forward. Such limited flexibility facilitates toeing-off, while reducing strain on the arches. Incidentally, Dr. Harry Hlavac, chief podiatrist at the sports clinic in San Francisco, has found a method of increasing shoe flexibility. To do this, slice through the bottom layer of rubber on the sole at its widest point (under the ball). One of two more cuts are also made on either side of the first, each being an inch apart.

The shoe you choose should meet your needs. Long-distance training requires a durable, well-cushioned shoe. Weight is not of great importance. However, if you're planning on racing, some of the cushioning and durability may be sacrificed for flexibility and lightness.

When selecting a shoe, one of the first things to check is the last. As strange as this may sound, the last is actually the shape of the bottom of the shoe. The shape of the last should conform to the shape of the foot. If not, the foot may undergo undue strain. One way of matching foot shape to last shape is to trace the outline of your foot on paper and compare it to the last.

The soles of training shoes should feature a tough outer layer of rubber over a softer under-layer. Good soles are at least one-half inch in thickness. Soft, cushiony sponge rubber heels and soles should be avoided. Sponge rubber cannot provide enough resistance against shock and does not flex evenly. Although hard nylon and high-density rubber do a better job of resisting shock, they provide little in the way of cushioning. Therefore, the combination of tough and soft rubber which was mentioned earlier may provide a happy medium.

The heel design is another important aspect. The shoe should be designed such that the heel of the foot is slightly higher than the ball. An elevated heel relieves strain on dual benefits of increased stability and extra cushioning.

A number of other factors must also be considered. Most obvious of these is fit. An improperly fitting shoe can be a source of great agony for the runner. The upper should be snug, but not overly so. Most shoes are built in standard C and D widths. Fortunately for runners with feet that are wider or narrower than the standard sizes, the New Balance company features a wide variety of shoe widths. However, these shoes are somewhat expensive and are difficult to obtain in Canada. In Kingston, only Cupolo's carries this brand. Finlay's is expecting them soon.

Whether or not you wear socks on your feet is usually a matter of choice. Many high-calibre runners go without socks. But for most of us, socks may be needed to prevent blisters. Nylon socks should be avoided, as the fabric tends to chafe; wool and cotton are better. Dr. Kenneth Cooper, author of the popular book "Aerobics" suggests that two pairs of socks be worn - a thin inner pair and a more substantial outer pair. The inner pair absorbs most of the friction that is generated by the shoe.

One last tip in buying shoes - take your time and try on a number of pairs. A few extra minutes spent in the store may prevent hours of pain later.

The beginning runner may be amazed by the almost endless variety of shoe brands. While on the subject of brands, it may be worthwhile to relate a bit of "historic" information. The brothers Rudi and Adi Dassler were among the first to manufacture athletic shoes for runners. However, disagreements led to the parting of the duo, and each brother formed his own company. Adi developed the "Adidas" brand while Rudi originated the "Puma". Later, the Japanese company "Tiger" entered the market. A dispute between Tiger's U.S. distributor and the manufacturer resulted in the formation of yet a fourth company - Nike. Competition has become stiff, as the number of contenders increases. Other popular brands include Karhu of Finland, E.B. Sport International of Germany, Pony of Canada, and two American brands, Brooks and New Balance. Brooks has become especially popular. Their "Vantage" was rated number 1 in a study conducted by Runner's World magazine, while Canadian Consumer rated the "Villanova" as the second-best shoe (next to Bauer's "Targa"). Nike has also become a popular name in running shoes.

It is usually best to stick with the dependable names in high-quality shoes. Although you might have to pay a little more for quality, the expense is worth it. I surveyed Kingston's sports and department stores and found that most carried the popular brands. S&R and Woolco

Some get off to a better start than others

(at the Frontenac Mall) have the largest selection in this area. However, since S&R's stock is "broken", you might have difficulty in finding some sizes. Brooks runners are hard to come by in Kingston - only S&R and Cupolo's stock this brand. Nikes may be purchased at Alford's, S&R, and the La Salle Sport Centre.

I also spoke with Dr. M.A. Simurda, orthopedic surgeon at KGH and assistant professor of surgery at Queen's, on the subject of foot and leg injuries and their prevention. Dr. Simurda pointed out that the metatarsals (the "toe bones") and the tibia and fibula (the two bones of the lower leg) of joggers may be susceptible to stress fractures. The patella, or kneecap, may also become problematic if the alignment is improper. Shin splints, the tenderness and pain associated with swelling of the muscles of the lower leg, may result from overexertion by untrained runners. However, this particular ailment is, clinically, somewhat rare in this area. Dr. Simurda saw only two cases of joggers' shin splints last year and estimates that there may be less than a half-dozen such cases in the Kingston area per year.

Top-quality shoes are recommended for the prevention of foot and leg injuries. Slow, gradual conditioning and running on soft surfaces (ie. golf courses) are also recommended for the beginner. Runners should avoid sharp turns. For this reason, Dr. Simurda advises against using Queen's indoor track for sustained running - the corners are too sharp.

In all, if the prospective runner applies discretion and care in his choice of footwear and training methods, he should experience many miles of safe, injury-free running. Choosing the proper shoe is the first step in the right direction to better running and, consequently, better health.

Jogging has no finish line

Reggae reigns as Marley wails

For a while, it seemed as though he was content to leave the audience in a sedate mood. But Bob Marley and the Wailers caught a fire midway through the concert in Maple Leaf Gardens last Friday night. It was during "I shot the sheriff" that Marley and the band brought the 12,000 assembled fans to their feet clapping and dancing in time with the reggae beat.

Bob Marley is a player of particular political prominence. It was the power of his music and lyrics that provoked an armed attack on his band a few years ago—an attack that spurned a move from Jamaica to Miami. In the concert he seemed to shy away from songs on his latest release, Kaya, preferring instead to play from earlier more political albums, unleashing a musical energy in tune with the revolutionary spirit of his lyrics. The effect was electrifying.

When things really started to cook, Marley, with hair curled in long Rastafarian dreadlocks, stripped off his rhythm guitar and danced. The dance was one of those high points, those magic moments that mesmerize an audience and keep the energy flowing. Moving his arms in slow "airplane" circles and flexing his knees, Marley belted out an intense rendition of "Liven up yourself". His "herb stagger" was later repeated for the encore performance of the title track of his Exodus album, while the swaying fans supplied the chorus.

Throughout the concert, the stage lights worked in intricate conjunction with the music. When a song was about to begin, the lights exuded a soft, cool glow in anticipation of the music and then blasted forth from behind in a blaze of whites and yellows. Bob Marley and the Wailers would then stand out as silhouettes, their huge shadows reaching out beyond the confines of the stage. With the whole arena glowing, the black became as magnificent as the light itself and the interplay between the two was a true stoner's delight.

A note on the back-up band is obligatory. They were called Tower of Power, a white jazz and soul band from Oakland that didn't quite make it in the horrible acoustic baffle of the Gardens. The result was a sound that was more like uncontrolled noise—too much brass and not enough driving bass. To be fair, I don't think it was their kind of playing ground.

Concert to feature old and new

Typed by Tim Greenwood

Good Canadian sound is rolling into Kingston again. On June 22 in Jock Harty arena The Cooper Brothers are featured along with ex-Guess Who superstar, Burton Cummings. As for Cummings, most people have already formed opinions of his music at some point—either you like him or you don't. Cummings is star of international fame, winning dozens of music industry awards for his first solo album which included tunes like "I'm Scared" and "Stand Tall". At home, the Canadian AM stations have virtually flogged him to death with the kind of media overexposure that can destroy even the best of performers—somehow Cummings has survived it all.

By far the most interesting prospect for the upcoming concert is the appearance of the new group from Ottawa, The Cooper Brothers. Formed a number of years ago by brothers Brian and Richard Cooper, the band first got a name by drawing big crowds in their hometown of Ottawa. Their tours to date have been limited in keeping with their status as a relatively unheard of, up-and-coming band.

The Cooper Brothers cut their first album in 1977 in Toronto and the tunes on this release attracted the professional marketing talents at Capricorn Records from the U.S.

Notables among the band members include Les Emmerson, one-time leader of the Five Man Electrical Band and Darryl Algerie, a vocalist whose skill with a twelve string guitar make him a valuable asset to The Cooper Brothers.

Keith Norton clears things up?

Dear Editors:

I have always enjoyed, though not necessarily agreed with, the discussion of social issues and constructive criticism of government actions which well-researched and thoughtful editorials often generate. Unfortunately, your editorial of May 9, "A Curiously Selective Opposition" does not fall into that category.

First of all, I must point out that the health care system in Ontario operates under the Ministry of Health, and is not, as you have implied, part of the Ministry of Community and Social Services. Secondly, neither the Honourable Dennis Timbrell, as Minister of Health, nor I, as Minister of Community and Social Services, have jurisdiction over the measures by which the Province of Ontario raises its revenues. Recommendations on these matters fall within the purview of the Provincial Treasurer, the Honourable D'Arcy McKeough.

I do not pretend to dissociate myself from the proposed OHIP premium increase. As a member of the Legislature, and the Cabinet, I supported the original proposal, but the statement that I proposed the "37 percent increase in OHIP premiums as part of the provincial government's cutbacks in the social services sector" is incorrect.

It is worth noting, I think, that in fact, the actual increase proposed was 14.4 percent when considered as a weighted average. One in five Ontarians receive free coverage under OHIP and one in four receive free coverage or premium assistance which reduces their financial burden. Only those citizens within a specific income bracket would have received an increase of 37 percent.

I also take exception to your claim that the provincial government is cutting back in the social services sector. At a time when some sectors of government have been asked to make do with fewer absolute dollars, social services was given budgetary increase for 1978-79 of 6.3 percent.

Notwithstanding the fact that I have no authority to institute OHIP fee increases, I have no idea how you came to the conclusion that the government had no intention of consulting the Legislature! The OHIP increase was part of the Budget statement presented to the Legislature by Mr. McKeough on March 7, 1978. The Budget has always been regarded as one of the major opportunities for the Government and the Opposition to discuss at some length, the proposed economic program for the coming year. Eight sitting days are allowed for Budget debate, and two of those days are specifically set aside for Opposition criticism.

The Opposition may therefore move a vote of non-confidence, whether such a vote is precipitated by an individual piece of legislation or not. I fail to see how anyone could claim that the Opposition is powerless to act in the face of actions with which it disagrees.

Perhaps if you had taken the time to review the Budget presented by the Treasurer, you would have seen that post-secondary education remains a priority of the Ontario government. Even with the well-established need for government restraint, the increase allotted to post-secondary education for the coming year was 6.4 percent. I have already noted that in relation to other sectors of government, this increase must be viewed as an indication of government priority.

You have suggested that increased funds for social services could be obtained from "more questionable areas of expenditure", but you fail to suggest what these areas might be. As Mr. McKeough said on March 7: "To those who would say to us, the job can be better done, I would suggest that they lay the specifics before this Legislature, so that the school boards, the municipalities, the public service unions and citizens groups - each of which claims to deserve more - can respond."

As a result of Opposition actions, $271 million had to be found from alternative sources, such as the Ontario Development and Ontario Housing Corporations, highways and government buildings construction, the Northern Regional Priority Program and capital projects for universities.

Certainly, the Opposition's response to the proposed OHIP increase posed a much greater threat to all budget allocations, including social services, than did the original government budget.

The need for restraint in government spending causes difficulties for all of us, but it is an essential process if we are to improve business confidence and provide room for job creation in the private sector, particularly for young people who are new and eager additions to the labour force.

As your provincial representative, I and my staff would be happy to provide you with information on any area of government involvement, discuss your concerns, or answer questions. I sincerely hope that in future, you will take me up on this offer.

Yours very truly,
Keith C. Norton, Minister

Our reply to Norton

Editors Reply:

Mr. Norton seems to love to play with statistics. He states the average increase in OHIP premiums would have been only 14.4 per cent, not the reported 37 per cent. We presume the 14.4 per cent increase will be paid by those Ontarians having 2.6 children and 1.1 cars. The reality of the matter is that a considerable number of Ontarians were to face a 37 per cent increase.

The Ontario government is quick to point out the difference between real and absolute dollars when it suits their argument, but seem to bury the subtle difference when referring to "increases" of 6.4 per cent in the University funding. Any increase of less than the current rate of inflation of 10 per cent is in real terms a net decrease in funding.

Mr. Norton explains at length of the increases in government spending. Let's face reality Mr. Norton, there are no real increases this year. The medicine is hard enough to swallow without members of parliament trying to confuse us unsuccessfully, with statistical jargon. If the increases referred to in the early sections of your letter really do exist, why do you insist in the latter part that we all must suffer in times of restraint?

We are not arguing for real increases, but merely for the maintenance of the lowest per capita spending by any provincial government in Canada. We are, after all, the richest province. You speak of priorities: if other provinces can spend more on universities per capita on less income per capita, then why can you not accomplish the same magic. Tories can't complain of not being in office long enough.

Lastly, the cutbacks are hurting everyone, but they are hurting us more, because we're receiving a larger cutback than many other services, despite your claim we are a priority. What level of priority are you referring to? Not only is there less pie for us all, but universities are not getting the same percentage of the pie as in the past. Once again your priorities are in question.

We thank you for your reply, many politicians would not have taken the time to respond, but please don't assume we aren't familiar with the facts.

Possibly the Campus Activities Commissioner could look into some of these suggestions, because I am sure the poor woman raising fuses would just love to be receiving praise for her apple turnovers. These ideas may seem half-baked, but they are no worse than weathering out a Hurricane Arnold.

'Hissicane' feminists raise cain

by Terrence Reynolds

It seems, as usual, that a minor pressure group has gone too far. The Women's Lib Movement has, in the past, been fairly good; by generating equality of wages and jobs, etc. (although it must be admitted that if wives stayed in the kitchens and tried to bring their children up decently, rather than flitting around in offices, our staggering unemployment rate could be alleviated). Women who insist on wearing the pants of the household are really skirting the issue without addressing the problem, and rival antagonists in the debate could threaten to come to blouse, or at best, they would have to sweater out.

Personally, the major objection I have to the excesses of the movement involves the future alteration of hurricane names. Previously, all of these natural calamities have been named after females, who normally tend to be more long-winded anyway. Now the feminists have forced their views on the matter, whether we want them to or not. Could you imagine a Hurricane Fred or Hurricane Barney? It just will not work, but will have to remain as long as the feminists rein supreme.

The downpour of opposition to male hurricanes has been growing, especially in the sea port circles. The seasoned fisherman have been used to looking at the sky and saying, "She looks like she'll be a big blow." Most of them will not feel natural saying this about a male hurricane. The entire matter is very explosive, but then so is a hurricane. Everyone knows that hurricane will blow up a river, which is not very nice.

Meanwhile, women have been infiltrating all the jobs formerly reserved for guys, but they are getting the easy tasks. In construction, all the poor male saps are breaking their backs with shovels while the girls are flagging traffic. Actually, this job should come easy to most girls I know, because their two flagging signs, stop and slow, are the words I hear from most of them. It must be conceded, however, that some girls do have faces that could stop traffic (or sink one thousand ships), but this is no reason to unleash some chick in working clothes onto the highway. My suggestion would be to hire cute girls in tight hot pants and halter tops, with signs saying "park" and "okay." These words would be much more aesthetically appealing to the male driver and could make the project constructive in more ways than one.

Also, there remains a double standard with the courting game. Even though we are supposedly sexually liberated, there can still be many problems. If you have a lovely evening with a nice girl and proceed to have a lovely night, for no apparent reason she gets upset.

Finally, it seems to me this movement, like all lunatic fringes, has too much power and nowhere to go. What if they plot to kidnap the Prime Minister and force him to undergo a sex change, thereby placing a woman at the top rather than underneath. What if they form their own separate mystical religions where they live without men, reading books like the Joy of Sects?

Perhaps it would be better if we harnessed all the energy and obvious talent of the Libbers for the good of mankind. These women could organize bazaars and possibly more sewing bees, where prizes could be awarded to the lucky girl who could sew the nicest shirt for her man. Also, church suppers have always been a hit and the ladies seem to get quite a kick out of organizing them. They have to delegate people to make the potato salad, and the deep brown beans, and decide who would get to make the delicious fudge.

Possibly the Campus Activities Commissioner could look into some of these suggestions, because I am sure the poor woman raising fuses would just love to be receiving praise for her apple turnovers. These ideas may seem half-baked, but they are no worse than weathering out a Hurricane Arnold.

Carleton violates COU recruiting standards

by Anne Johnson

Carleton University is violating the Council of Ontario Universities' guidelines by telephoning prospective students in an effort to convince them to enrol at Carleton.

Carleton's intensive campaign to maintain its enrollment level this year has included hundreds of personal telephone calls to a select number of first year applicants, according to a story in the Charlatan.

The council was specifically concerned about the universities who were making the calls, as they were a "clear violation of the guidelines (established by COU)," said Edward Monahan, Executive Director of COU.

The guidelines state that universities must avoid any actions that could be interpreted as implicit or explicit offers of admission, residence, or scholarship in advance of set dates. Phone calls could be misinterpreted as offers of admission by students, it is claimed.

questionable tactics

Patrick O'Brien, Carleton's High School Liaison officer said "We're in a situation now where the supply in students has decreased. We are aware of the competition now, and I think we have to move with the times. In the past we have been conservative and non-aggressive about recruiting, now it's a matter of survival."

Carleton's intensive campaign has also included a tour of 15 Ontario cities by university representatives to establish personal contacts with individual high schools, and an all-expense paid luncheon at Carleton for Ottawa area high school counsellors and principals.

Queen's Assistant Registrar, D.N. Ellis, said "one of Queen's strengths is that they haven't had to use a hard sell technique to get students to come here."

Ellis admitted that Queen's hasn't had the same large drop in applications that other universities have had. "Queen's is enjoying a favourable position as our drop in applications was only half of the total provincial drop."

The COU established their recruiting guidelines in 1973, but because it is solely a consultative body, it has never penalized universities for violating its guidelines.

Because of the number of complaints received concerning the recruiting practices of some Ontario universities, the COU is planning to set up a watchdog agency to control the competition for students between Ontario's 15 universities, the Globe and Mail recently reported.

Token membership in AUCC incites potential student departure

[Staff]

Student participation in the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada (AUCC) may be permanently discontinued. As a result of a motion put forward by AUCC student delegates, the student caucus and student affairs committee of that organization may be dissolved.

The motion was tabled at the annual business meeting held June 19-20. As a result, discussion of the motion has been put off until next year's annual meeting.

The matter was promoted by the continued frustration among the student delegates to be able to participate effectively in decision-making at AUCC.

The main issues of contention are the selection procedure of student delegates to annual conferences and the procedure for nominating students for election to the AUCC's Board of Directors.

Student delegates to AUCC are presently selected by University presidents, a procedure which has led to charges from student organizations that delegates are both uninformed and non-representative of student interests.

The student caucus advocates that students be selected by local student councils thereby ensuring that the above problems are circumvented.

Nominations of students for election to the AUCC Board of Directors is presently carried out by the AUCC Nominating Committee, which has no student representatives.

The delegates want students up for election to the Board to be nominated by the student caucus so that election candidates will better represent student concerns.

As a result of the plenary's tabling of the motion, student caucus members will be contacting all Canadian post secondary student councils to solicit their opinions on student participation in AUCC.

Depending on the response from the councils, there may be no student delegates attending the next conference.

Dave Brown, AMS President and the Queen's student delegate to the recent meeting, has written a letter to Principal Ronald Watts outlining the student frustrations with AUCC. Brown also pointed out the lack of information available to the student caucus.

These points of contention are not new. Jamie Avis, AMS President in 1976-77, expressed similar concerns during his term of office. The situation has not changed since that time.

Theological College affiliates with Queen's

by Jennifer Conkie

Queen's Theology College has been fighting a losing battle to retain its autonomy from centralized government control, in the past few years. Three years ago, the provincial government proposed to administer the B.I.U. grants for theological colleges in Ontario via the universities. The conditions of the proposal, linking theology schools with parent universities which were to award the degree and establish the standards of admission and curriculum, stemmed from the two-fold desire for centralized administration and assured academic respectability.

Five Ontario sschools could comply with the conditions set forth McMaster, Waterloo, St. Paul's in Ottawa, St. Augustan's in Scarborough, and Queen's. Within the last month, all of these colleges, with the exception of Queen's have agreed to the plan with little objection.

In 1975, there was a full-scale discussion at Queen's Theological College for several months. The College Board decided against the government proposal for centralized control (a decision which was to cost

Royal family sends son to Queen's

By Tim Greenwood

A member of the Japanese Royal family has this summer begun a planned two years of study at Queen's.

At home in Japan his official title is His Imperial Highness, Prince Norohito. A nephew of Emperor Hirohito he is ninth in line to the throne. At Queen's the role of prince has been superseded by that of student, and there is little that distinguishes him from any other foreign student learning English. He has an informal rather than a majestic manner, and this casual air is accentuated by his RCMP bodyguard speaking to him simply as "Nori". Bill and John, the two RCMP bodyguards who have been assigned to the prince as a precautionary measure, are two solid factors that distinguish the Prince from just any other student. However, by taking turns accompanying the Prince, and by maintaining a low profile, the two manage to fulfill their duties while still remaining inobtrusive.

Prince Norohito explained he wanted to study English in either Canada or England, and he chose Canada because his eldest brother had already studied at Oxford. Queen's was picked out of four Canadian universities recommended by the Japanese Embassy because it was similar in size to the school he attended in Tokyo, the Prince said.

This is Prince Norohito's first extended trip abroad and he said the adjustment to Canadian life has been "very hard", but since "everything is a new experience" he has also found it exciting. Prince Norohito said he actually prefers the relative quiet of Kingston to the hubbub of Tokyo. "I like this environment. Tokyo is too crowded, and there are too many people over there."

The Prince does not feel his RCMP escorts seriously restrict his freedom and noted it was something he was becoming accustomed to, for "I had two members of the Emperor's Household Police guarding me since the end of last year." He added that Bill and John are good English teachers providing him with "many chances to speak English."

The Prince is currently attending the Queen's Summer School of English. He has not yet decided on his courses for the fall term, observing that his choices will be influenced by how confident he feels with English at the time.

When Prince Norohito returns to Japan after finishing his studies he will have no official duties but there will be several avenues open to him. He may take on a job with the government, or give his name to a social institute but as a member of the Royal family he is prohibited from working in a private corporation, noted Araki. Prince Norohito observed that the occupations his older brothers have chosen hold an appeal for him. One brother works with the handicapped while the other works for the Japanese National Broadcast Association.

Enrollment down 20 percent

Pending final figures, enrollment for the 1978 Arts and Science Summer session are down approximately 20% from 1977.

New director

Staff

Robert F. Swain, 35, of Stratford, Ont. is the new director of the Agnes Etherington Art Centre at Queen's University, effective mid-August.

Born in Halifax and educated at Carleton University, Mr. Swain was registrar of the National Museum of Science and Technology from 1968 to 1973. He left Ottawa to become director of The Gallery in Stratford. Apart from his administrative duties with the gallery and the development of exhibition programs, he was active on the Stratford City Council and the Chamber of Commerce. He is also a director of the Ontario Association of Art Galleries.

Mr. Swain succeeds Michael Bell who left Queen's at the end of January this year to join the Ontario Arts Council in Toronto.

trend which began after enrollment peaked in 1971. He felt he could "cite a lot of reasons" for the decreasing number of summer students, but stated the major reason was that it is no longer possible for elementary school teachers to start teaching before completing a university degree. Now, relatively few new people are signing up for the summer session, and instead the majority of summer students are already attending Queen's on a full or part-time basis.

"As much as 50% are students who were taking a full course load in the fall," said Mr. Wardle.

Unavoidably, the declining enrollment numbers have had some effect on the number and selection of courses offered in summer school each year, and this summer there are ten fewer courses listed than that of the 1977 session. However, Mr. Wardle stated that the university "tries very hard not to cancel courses" and that "only two half courses and one full course had to be cancelled due to insufficient enrollment" this year. Nevertheless, introductory courses have fewer students enrolled than the courses at the 200 levels, thus offering another indication that students just beginning B.A. programs are no longer coming to summer school.

Quite an interesting turnaround however, is that enrollment figures in the Faculty of Education at McArthur College have almost doubled over last year. Professor Malcolm Applegate, Director of Continuing Education at the college, said that this summer close to 900 students have enrolled compared with the 456 last year.

"Teachers are becoming very interested in highly specialized programs," said Professor Applegate and he felt that this was because most were anxious to put themselves in a competitive position in the job market with additional qualifications.

In addition to the Ministry of Education Certificate programs, the professor said that there were a number of spring and summer non-credit "workshops" which were also very well enrolled. He found it both interesting and encouraging that people were willing to give up time for non-credit courses and stated that a "number of their programs have developed high credibility throughout the province."

Camp Outlook launches summer season

By Tim Greenwood

Camp Outlook's eighth summer season began a few weeks ago as the first batch of campers ranging in age from thirteen to seventeen were sent off with Outlook staff for ten days of canoeing and camping in Algonquin Park. By the summer's end close to 144 kids who probably would not have had the chance otherwise will have spent ten days away from the glare of TV and all the other luxuries of home.

The inspiration for Outlook came from former Queen's student Ron Kimberley who founded the camp eight years ago after noticing the beneficial effects of canoe tripping on a group of kids he took camping. Outlook has grown considerably in its eight short years; as one oldtimer observed, the original equipment was "begged, borrowed, and occasionally bought" but today they own their own canoes and through a Wintario grant were able to afford a 20 passenger bus.

The present Outlook staff consists of a healthy mixture of Queen's students, ex-campers and interested Kingston residents. Though a tripping background is desirable the only definite requirement is that the staff must want to work with kids.

Nerve centre for Outlook is ten Aberdeen street where trips set out by bus and where hungry staff gather to eat. Last Sunday I sat on the steps of what the staff affectionately called "Outhouse" discussing the camp with the coordinators of the full-time summer program, Rob Rail and Janet Longmore.

"The idea behind Outlook is to teach campers to be good canoe trippers hoping that after experiencing all the ups and downs of a ten day trip they'll be able to carry their success experience back to their home environment" Janet explained. "The kids we get are ones who due to their social or financial background wouldn't have a chance to do something like this." The kids are referred by such agencies as Children's Aid, Probation and Aftercare, Big Brothers and Sisters and Training Schools Janet stated. "We're branching into new areas of the Kingston community this year" she added. "For example this year we have some referrals from the Beechgrove Children's Centre."

Explaining the funding Rob said one quarter comes from agency fees, one quarter comes from different faculties as well as the Danceathon and the final half comes from private donations.

Outlook also runs a weekend program with shorter canoe trips, rock climbing and organized baseball games. Relying on its volunteer staff a winter camping program as well as a followup program is run during the year.

U of C forced to cut programs

OPINION SPECIAL

The University of Calgary, like many of Canada's universities, is feeling the pressure of financial restraint. The university has received $62 million to cover its operating costs for the 1978-79 year. This represents an 8.5% increase in funds as compared to those of the past year. Due to the effects of inflation, however, these allotments are insufficient to maintain the university's current level of service.

As a result, U of C has been forced to cut back on a number of programs and operations. A proposed masters degree in communications may have to be cancelled. In a move designed to save $20,000 a year, the university has decided to close its greenhouses. The physical plant has also been ordered to cut $40,000 from its operating budget.

All this in spite of the fact that U of C has made significant achievements during its brief history. For example, the University of Calgary is said to be the nation's leading university in energy research.

Calgary is not alone, as other universities in the province are also being forced to operate on tight budgets. Grants for Alberta's institutes for 1978-79 have increased by 8.21 per cent over those of 1977-78. However, these increases in budgets are less than those of previous years.

Become a Laboratory Science Technologist

by enrolling in a two-year, 6 semester program at St. Lawrence College Graduates of the Laboratory Science Technology program at St. Lawrence College, Kingston Campus have found challenging careers and opportunities for advancement in the chemical, biochemical, pharmaceutical, food processing and brewing industries.

Graduates will have the skills necessary to work in research and development, processing, quality control, manufacturing and sales.

The Laboratory Science Technology program is a six semester program which offers students the option of completion in two 10-month sessions.

Entrance requirements consist of an Ontario School Graduation Diploma with year 4, academic level 5 (advanced level) credits in mathematics, chemistry, English, and one of biology or physics at level 5, year 3 or better. It is recognized that some high schools do not offer all identified subjects at level 5 prior to Grade 13. However, if that particular school indicates that the student meets the prerequisites for two different sciences at the Grade 13 level these qualifications will be recognized for entrance. Grade 13 and post-secondary school applicants may be granted advanced credits on a course by course basis as warranted.

SWAPO fights for free Namibia

by Kathleen Orr

In the late nineteenth century, Germany took the southwestern part of Africa and made it one of her colonies, when the "scramble" for Africa was becoming just that. After World War I, Germany's colonies were taken away from her. The League of Nations mandated the south-west African territory (known as Namibia to its African inhabitants), to South Africa for administration on the understanding that the country would be administered in the interests of its citizens. The South African government favoured the white minority in Namibia, as it did in its own country, and carried on repressive measures towards the blacks.

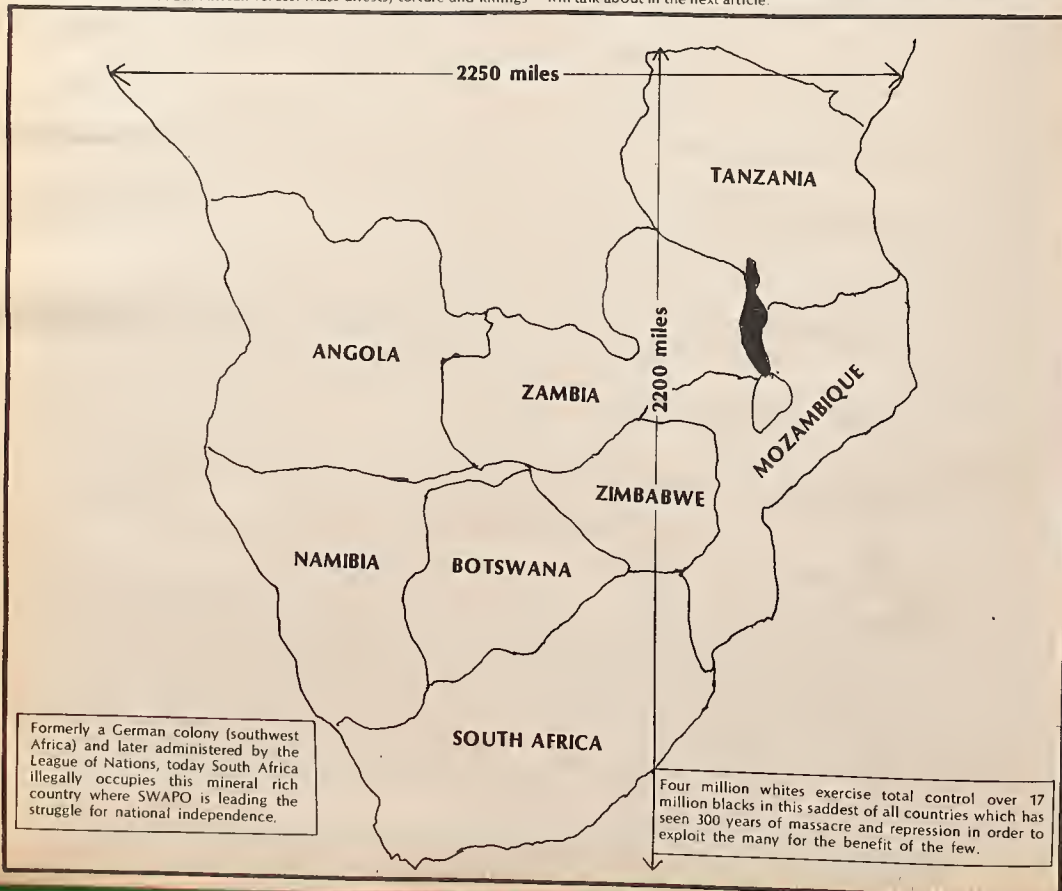

Because of this repressive government, the United Nations decided to revoke the mandate in 1946, and the South African authority was legally ended. South Africa however, refused to recognize this decision, claiming that only the League of Nations could revoke the mandate. The police force and army remained in Namibia.

During the late fifties, with help from the African National Congress, black Namibians began to organize themselves, holding political meetings to plan a non-violent resistance to the repression. Initially the group was organized in the Ovamboland region in the northern part of Namibia, by Sam Nujuma. Its cause was felt by many more however, so the popularity of the movement quickly spread. To ensure a more national appeal, Sam Nujuma, its president, named the group the South-West African People's Organization (SWAPO). Boycotts, protests, demonstrations and meetings were held to make the South African government aware that Namibians would no longer put up with the severe repression. These protests were met by violent and brutal actions of the South African forces. Mass arrests, torture and killings

The brutality of the South African police force led SWAPO to resort to violent means of protest, because they felt they had no other choice. They were no longer willing to be treated as second class non-citizens and slave labour within their own country. Needing military assistance and training, SWAPO appealed for such aid, declaring that they would accept it from any country. The Soviet Union, some socialist countries, and the Organization of African Unity, were the only ones to respond with this sort of aid. By 1966, SWAPO had a military branch called the People's Liberation Army of Namibia (PLAN), trained to fight with guerrilla war tactics. Sam Nujuma, the group's leader, realized the danger of SWAPO's existence within the country, as many of its leaders were being arrested and killed. For this reason, the SWAPO headquarters was moved out of Namibia.

SWAPO has been recognized by the United Nations as the future government of that country, responsible for running free elections when the land is free. SWAPO is the only group within the country which has not been banned by Vorster, the South African president, because of the group's international status and recognition. This group gets a lot of political and moral support from religious groups, aid organizations and foreign countries, but there are many forces being used against SWAPO too. The South African government is fighting SWAPO with military force, as well as its own propaganda, and has a great deal more money than SWAPO does for such purposes. The sources of the South African wealth, and Vorster's political reasons for campaigning so strongly within the country, are things which I will talk about in the next article.

Formerly a German colony (southwest Africa) and later administered by the League of Nations, today South Africa illegally occupies this mineral rich country where SWAPO is leading the struggle for national independence.

Four million whites exercise total control over 17 million blacks in this saddest of all countries which has seen 300 years of massacre and repression in order to exploit the many for the benefit of the few.

Oot and Aboot is irresponsible

Dear Editor,
Re: "Oot & Aboot in Kingston" article
Tuesday, June 6th, 1978

Everyone, I think, can appreciate the 'mystery' of a time past which can be found within an old abandoned home - a time once lived and now only remembered by the remains of a few simple artifacts.

However, what right is given 'any' person to enter a home where they are not welcome either by law of ownership within a country, or by the conscience within the intruder? If one likes searching out abandoned places and finding artifacts from other times, is it so difficult to attempt to find out who might own this dwelling? On Wolfe Island, particularly, the community is small, and as a result nearly all residents would know who would own the house. If the owner has neglected or discarded the home, he/she might be quite willing to let you explore it, if one only asked first. And even if they said no, then you should respect their rights of ownership and forget about your anticipated 'act of adventure'. It seems to me, that more and more this generation is returning to a level of absolute degeneration not even comparable with the lowliest of animals. We seem to lack self-respect and self-honour and subsequently have no respect and honour for each other.

I can only look at the writer with a sincere amount of pity along with an overwhelming feeling of disgust, that he/she would encourage readers of the Journal to perpetuate an act that debases the rights of ownership and the values which people should hold most dear to them.

Another thought which alarms me, is that this article encourages petty thievery which could result in disastrous consequences for the thief or the owner. Often old homes may appear to be abandoned but could be seasonally lived in. Though the Island is quite large, it does have police surveillance and a lot of that surveillance is done in unmarked cars. Another point to consider is that a Citizen can report you and a police car will be definitely waiting on the other side of the lake for you.

You, as a 'little' adventurer must think about any or all of these things before you even consider committing such an act.

Bakke case reviewed

Special

Allan Bakke, a white man who contended he was refused admission to medical school due to reverse discrimination, has won his case as the U.S. Supreme Court in a recent decision voted 5-4 to strike down the University of California-Davis Medical School's quota system.

Despite fears by members of the Civil Rights Movement this decision does not appear as if it will put an end to the so-called affirmative action programs established to give members of minority groups more of a representative position in U.S. society. The Court ruled Davis' rigid quota system violates the Civil Rights Act of 1964 but it maintains that race might still legitimately be an element in judging the eligibility of students for admission to universities.

Bakke, a 38-year-old engineer, has spent five years fighting his case. He argued that he was denied admission while lesser qualified applicants were accepted due to Davis' policy of reserving 16 out of its 100 places for students from disadvantaged minority groups.

A majority of the Justices favoured the approach toward minority students taken by Harvard University which does not set a rigid quota yet allows race to tip the balance in favour of a minority student.

Coretta King, the widow of slain Civil rights leader Martin Luther King, was quoted in a recent Globe and Mail story as saying she was heartened by the Court's decision. "I don't think it was a real victory for the civil right's movement because we would like to have seen a more specific ruling. But it's clear that the court came down on the side of affirmative action."

Susan Wright, a recent geography graduate of Queen's University, has won a Commonwealth scholarship covering travel, living and study costs at the University of Glasgow in Scotland for two years.

A native of Toronto, Susan received an Hons. BA with first class honors at spring convocation. She plans to study town and regional planning for a master's degree at the end of the two years.

About 1,000 students in Commonwealth countries around the world will receive scholarships this year; many will study in Britain, Canada, India, Australia and New Zealand. And a much smaller number will enrol in universities in other commonwealth countries such as Kenya, Malaysia, Hong Kong and Jamaica.

Unemployment takes toll

by Kathleen Orr

After being unemployed long enough for a feeling of permanence to set in, I felt inclined to turn to more intellectually pleasing activities. Not finding any, I decided to write for the student newspaper. And what better thing could I talk about than my on-going search for a job? The position of unemployment holds for itself certain special qualities unencountered in any other profession.

In this position, you meet thousands of new and different people every day, interesting people, people who you'll probably never see again. If sympathy had a dollar value, you could become a millionaire talking to these people, for although they cannot give you a job, they have untold quantities of sympathy for you. Some of these people are so sensitive that they cannot give you an answer over the phone, rather, they insist on you coming in for an interview to be told that there are no jobs available.

There comes a time when looking keen and bright for these interviews becomes more and more discouraging and difficult. Not only do your 'interview clothes' look worn out, but they tend to hang on you more loosely as your cupboards grow bare. Your enervating bike rides all over the city, in 90degree (oh sorry, 30 degree C) weather leave you looking less-than-pressed when you arrive at the interview.

When worst comes to worst, and you have lost all your pride, dignity, and self-respect, you can put on your most comfortable jeans and grungiest t-shirt, and peddle on down to the unemployment line where your pale undernourished face and weary eyes, are recognized as the norm. Soon you will be happily sipping cool drinks in the shade, listening to the radio, and you can afford once again to join in the intellectual pursuits more to your liking, - the cryptic crossword, a good book, and again, the student wrag, oh, sorry, newspaper.

Battlestar Galactica with warship blasting off.

"The Hardy Boys" is television's latest exhibition of America's current teenage cutie-pies, following the trail blazed by past "faves" Bobby Sherman and David Cassidy. With their mouths shut the teeny bop idols are merely uninteresting, with cutie-pie scripts like the one written for Battlestar Galactica, they are laughably irrelevant. In Battlestar Galactica, the line-up of beautiful young people is the first and most obvious signifier that the backbone of the film is grounded in the same appearance oriented mentality that continues to plague the air waves of TV. It doesn't make sense, but it looks good. The credibility of the characters rarely rises above a comic book level and even the seasoned talents of Lorne Greene fail to give the script any recognizably human punch.

But "Battlestar Galactica" makes no pretense about being anything but a Marvel space adventure transferred to celluloid. In light of the attention paid to special effects and fantastic stage sets, both in a monetary and cinematic sense, the film falls into that pit of phoniness less readily than it might otherwise. However, the temptation to emphasize effects over character in science fiction films has led to the ruin of potentially great epics and Galactica suffers from it as well.

In the case of Galactica, the lack of character depth is hardly the only hurdle it has to any claims of sci-fi greatness. The main story is inconsistent. Like most unimaginative science fiction stories, its appeal draws largely at a level of kiddie fantasy. Briefly, the plot revolves around the plight of the space battleship (or "battlestar") "Galactica" as it streaks away from the annihilated planets of mankind's once populated 12 colonies in an unknown galaxy on the other side of the universe. Adam, the commander of the Galactica leads the expedition to "Earth", "where other human life survives", meanwhile fighting off attacks from evil alien killers, the Cylons. The aura of scientific advancement in the film is curiously disproportionate throughout: incredibly fast and effortless space travel has been developed and yet the radar scanning is prehistoric; the people in the film have been at war for centuries but the military weaponry is only slightly ahead of that in World War II.

Battlestar Galactica is a cute package that has really nothing inside. As the closest thing produced so far to "Star Wars" II, the film is not a disappointment, with that thought in mind. As a contribution to the science fiction genre, it's a step backward.

WHATS IT? No, these aren't extensions of Kingston's sewage system, they are part of a sculpture exhibition sponsored by the Agnes Etherington Art Centre.

Prices up sharply in active student trading

The war is on. Carleton University has started the intense competition for high school students, embarking upon a telephone sales campaign for students and wining and dining high school principals. Such a situation could have been predicted with recent declining enrollments.

Rather than allow the universities to use hard-sell techniques on prospective students, perhaps a lesson should be taken from the National Hockey League.

In future, Grade 13 students could be pooled in November and selected by the universities in an inter-school board draft "Fat cat" schools would pick later in the rounds, while those schools experiencing enrollment difficulties would get earlier choices.

The possibilities are endless. Universities could claim territorial protection for certain high school star scholars. Signing bonuses of large scholarships and no-fail, no-transfer, long-term contracts would not be far off. Universities will be engaging in trade talks, sending high standing scholars to other institutions for cash and future consideration. And of course, underage scholars would be prevented from signing with a school under strict guidelines and penalties. Bright students would be forced to spend several years in Grade 13. For those universities with continued enrolment difficulties the possibility of picking up scholars on waivers always exists. Alternately, high priced imports might be welcomed once again. Even after the regular season is over, students can still look forward to the graduate playoffs.

Who knows, if Carleton isn't allowed to proceed with its current bargaining they may decide to form a separate university league.

Faculty Houses - Yes

The Editors,

I am writing to bring you up to date on the deliberations of the committee to investigate Faculty Houses.

First of all I think that the Campus should know more about the report that was sent back to the committee for further work. The final section of the report that proved to be most contentious involved factionalization of the Queen's Community. The recommendation from that part of the report read "That any undergraduate house be required to have an 'open door' policy. This would mean that a Queen's student card would be sufficient identification for admission to any undergraduate faculty house. In stating this we recognize the right of any faculty to restrict attendance at particular events." We will be gathering further information on the University Centre, and on proposed Faculty Houses in response to Council's concerns. Please be assured that the committee is giving thorough consideration to all aspects of this important issue. When this work is completed we will be reporting back to Council probably at the next meeting. Council will ultimately decide A.M.S. Policy on faculty houses.

Sincerely, Dave Brown
Pres. A.M.S.

Irresponsible journalism

The Editors,

I was very concerned by your Oct and Abbot column of June 6. Suggesting that Queen's students break into abandoned farm houses on Wolfe Island is irresponsible and unbecoming of a responsible columnist. These houses are private property, and although they appear abandoned, entering them is still trespass and removing property from them is still theft. The A.M.S. works very hard during the year to maintain good student-community relations. This good work can be jeopardized by students participating in this type of vandalism. If students are interested in our Heritage, Kingston is full of Museums and Antique stores. I hope that all community minded students will realize the implications of members of the Queen's Community violating the rights of others. I would be very disturbed if Queen's students were brought up on charges of theft and trespassing, and in reply to the prosecutor's questions replied, "I read about it in the Journal".

I'm sure that students would not appreciate it if the residents of Wolfe Island started treasure hunting in our apartments when they are abandoned over the summer.

Sincerely, Dave Brown
Pres. A.M.S.

Although we do not like to subtract from the benefits offered by the new University Centre, faculty houses can provide much-needed services as well as facilitate an exchange of ideas within the university community. In our opinion, their introduction will not contribute to the so-called factionalization problem. In view of the current interest in faculty houses and the lack of knowledge of their effects on the Queen's community, we think that it is irresponsible that you should recommend that summer council take a firm stand against faculty houses.

Sincerely,
Board of Directors
Queen's Grad Club, Inc.

Housing problems

Dear Sir,

In your editorial of the May 30 issue of the Journal, you oppose Faculty Houses on the grounds that they fractionate the university community along faculty lines as well as detract from the success of the new University Centre. That 1) no real benefits appear to be gained by their existence and 2) the development of both short and long-term problems (for the university community) are most certainly important reasons for condemning faculty houses. However, the rationale for these conclusions is questionable and subject to considerable discussion.

You agree that the faculty houses provide a social gathering place, but that they provide no services unique to the university. Nevertheless, they do provide an essential service to students given the overcrowding of the present services and the lack of many of the services offered by faculty houses.

This scarcity of meeting areas apparently justifies the need for the new and fully operational University Centre. It is, however, naive to think the Centre will draw the students from different faculties together to "facilitate an exchange of information and opinion". Certainly this aim is the hope of all, but the union simply provides services such as pool tables, bookstore, hair styling and so on which fall somewhat short of your ideals stated above. (Again, we must reiterate your view that Outer Council is an exception but how many people benefit from Outer Council per se?). Lounging areas and relaxed atmosphere are required, not the utter chaos of the most frequented area of the Centre, the Pub. Here, students are wedged into a particular table whether they like it or not. Possibly this is your idea of communicating between faculties. People who use the Pub usually seek out their friends, generally from their own faculty and with similar academic interests. Therefore, we question whether the University Centre will be any more effective in bringing faculties together. The fact that the money has been invested certainly does not guarantee the success you desire of this project.

As pointed out in your editorial, the faculty spirit is instilled into the students right from their first arrival on campus. If you are really concerned about factionation, why not start your campaign against faculty separation by eliminating orientation week and faculty colours? Evidently, it is the opinion of Queen's that identification with a particular faculty is not destructive. After all, it is within the faculty that one will exchange most ideas during academic training. Despite wishful thinking, the Centre facilities do not solve the much over-rated problem of faculty factionation.

In the case of Grad Club, it is truly interdisciplinary and thus reflects one of the goals of the university. Here, graduate students, who have a variety of backgrounds and interests, can hold seminars, engage in social activities, read or simply lounge. Surely, these not the "disruptive and sometimes fatal activities" that you speak of. Moreover, faculty houses are not necessarily elitist, for an open door policy to all students (for a fee) circumvents this problem.

Student unemployment rising

by Becky Boyce

The summer job prospect for students has continued its downward trend according to a recent release from Statistics Canada. The figures indicate that the province of Quebec is holding the highest rate of youth unemployment with Ontario running a close second. Last month, student unemployment in Ontario rose to a high of 16% (58,000 students) compared with 14.3% (51,000 students) for the same period last year. Overall, the Canadian student unemployment rate is slightly lower than Ontario, with the percentage of students out of work standing at 15% for June 1978.

National Union of Students (NUS) President, John Tuzyk, said "the new release of Statistics Canada (Statcan), unemployment figures exceeds our most pessimistic predictions".

Miriam Edelson, Chairperson of the Ontario Federation of Students (OFS/FEO), reacts strongly to what she terms the "damning figures" of Statcan. She points out that with the lack of summer jobs for students and tightened UIC requirements, many students are "out in the cold" without the money to return to college or university.

"Perhaps the most sorry aspect is that the job crisis hits hardest those least able to afford it. Students from low-income families are the least likely to find work. Often this means they just can't afford school in the fall," stated Ms Edelson.

Statistics seem to agree with Ms. Edelson's comment. There has been a decrease of 6,000 in the number of students who had originally elected to return to school in the fall. Allan Golombek, Information Officer at OFS, noted that this was an unusual shift in the figures.

"As the summer goes on the number of people planning to return to school generally increase. The sudden decline from 137,000 students to 131,000, is felt to be largely due to the decline in both summer and full-time employment opportunities for college and university students."

OFS is on record as favouring large-scale direct job creation programmes to fight the immediate crisis. Many of the federation's members feel that the Federal and Provincial Governments are not doing their share of summer job creation.

Admittedly, statistics do indicate that student employment is a highly dismal prospect, but without many of the federal and provincial grants that have been offered, the situation could clearly be much worse. Mike Morgan of the Job Creation Branch in Kingston says that the Federal government has allotted Kingston and the Islands $139,376.00 for the creation of 70 summer jobs in Young Canada Work (YCW) projects. Nevertheless, there were 48 other proposed YCW projects that were rejected by a Ministry Advisory Board earlier this year.

In addition to YCW grants, there are numerous provincially funded projects co-ordinated through the Ontario Youth Secretariat. These are the familiar "Experience" programmes which have provided a large variety of jobs for students throughout the province. Brian Reid of the Student Unemployment Bureau at 51 Queen Street in Kingston, indicated at least 40-50 students just from their files alone had found work on the provincial grants. Although Manpower did not do the actual hiring of these students, in each case they placed the student in contact with the regional co-ordinator of the projects they were interested in.

When asked who was sent to be interviewed when a job opened up, Mr. Reid explained that the potential employee is assessed in terms of his working interests, job experience, and education background. When a situation develops in which two or more people are equally qualified for a position, a new criterion, the financial need of the student, is taken into consideration. The student sent will tend to be the one with the

"Nine times out of ten this will be a university student or a grade 13 student who is planning post-secondary education in the fall," noted Reid.

Nevertheless, government grant projects are not the place to earn money. Employees of the YCW and Experience '78 programmes earn only minimum wage for their efforts and it is only the co-ordinator who receives a salary of $138 a week. Mr. Reid admitted that there had been some difficulty in finding qualified people to work for that amount of money.

Certainly there are other employment opportunities for students and Manpower estimates that they have helped approximately one thousand students find work. Job Bank on the main campus at Queen's takes credit for filling 1299 jobs with students on file. Unfortunately, most of Job Banks placements were casual or short-term employment with only 282 being full-time summer jobs. There are still over 1,000 students on file at Job Bank and close to 2,000 at the Unemployment Bureau downtown who are still actively seeking work. Julian Cunningham, an Arts '81 student at Queen's is one of those still on file.

"I find it depressing that almost any position requires experience. In order to gain experience one needs to work, but now, in order to work, one needs experience - a rather uncompromising circle for those of us unfortunate enough to be on its perimeter. Job Bank and Manpower are generally efficient, but in any case, very little has materialized - my fingers are still crossed," he said.

OSGP numbers down

Staff

The numbers of Ontario Student Grant Program (OSGP) applications filed at Queen's this year are down dramatically compared to the same time last year. As of July 14th, 30.8% fewer applications had been received.

According to Robert Merrifield, Queen's Student Awards Officer, the decline in applications may be partially a result of closer scrutiny of applicants by the Ontario Ministry of Colleges and Universities.

"The question we must ask ourselves is whether the new OSGP policy has eliminated those who should not have received aid and have used OSAP as a supplement, and whether we are now concentrating on people with a very great need."

The program this year is designed to ensure OSGP is a student's last resort for obtaining funds. Summer earnings and contributions from parents are expected to be applied first.

"Students should always use their own resources", said Merrifield. "People saw OSAP as a cheap source of money because the grants do not have to be repaid."

Although tighter government regulation of OSGP may be contributing to the fewer number of applications, Merrifield does not feel they necessarily will be down all year. The forms are now much more complicated than they were in the past, specifically because assets are now taken into consideration and parents and students may be taking longer to fill out the forms.

Journal trades with Laval

by Gord Howe

The Journal has arranged to exchange articles with Au Fils des Evenements, the social-cultural newspaper of the University of Laval in Quebec.

The exchange is one part of the planned Queen's-Laval twinning project being administered by Hugh Dodd, AMS External Affairs Commissioner designed to promote a greater awareness on the part of Queen's students of the cultural diversity within Canada.

Starting in September the Journal will reprint in translation selected articles from the Laval paper dealing with topics of interest to Queen's students. The Laval publication will in turn extract articles from the Journal and reprint them.

Staff

As a consequence of this summer's mindboggling heat and resultant inlander wanderings toward the lake, most people on campus will have had the pleasurable experience of savouring a cold, refreshing cone at Alan's Ice Cream Emporium. Alan, the proprietor, is always ready with a friendly smile to offer you personable service and discuss the wonders of the universe or more immediate issues. His business is his pleasure and he attempts to please his customers with good service.

Policy planned

by Becky Boyce

Last month, John Koopman, Rory Cattanch, and Dave Brown went on a two day executive retreat outside Huntsville, Ontario to discuss AMS policies for the coming school year.

"We spent nine hours each day discussing virtually everything that we thought we would encounter during the school year," said AMS President Dave Brown. "Many of the matters discussed were exclusive to the executive. For instance, we decided that each of us would have a project that we would carry out through the year in order that we could all have a particular goal for each of the commissions."

In addition to these more internal issues, such things as faculty houses, cut backs, student fees, and Bus-it were discussed. In September, an OFS conference has been arranged on campus in an attempt to gain the Federation a "higher profile" at Queen's.

"The retreat was a real turning point for the three of us in terms of locating things and working out some sort of strategy for the rest of the year," commented Brown.

More seats possible

Pub gets door

On Tuesday March 7 of this year, the "quiet pub" in the McLaughlin Room of the University Centre was opened, with a proposed capacity of 85 people. However, after one day of operation, the capacity was reduced to 59 by order of the local fire marshal. This action was due to the fact that the number of fire exits in the room was deemed insufficient.

During the remainder of that month, while operating the pub at reduced capacity, the Alma Mater Society suffered a loss of nearly four thousand dollars.

Oddly enough, the original plan which was drawn up some four years ago contained an extra fire door. However, somewhere in the process between planning and construction, the door was omitted.

Recently, the management of the University Centre approved the construction of the fire door, contingent on the agreement of the fire warden to increase the seating capacity of the room. Although certain stipulations concerning the design of the fire door must be met, it is anticipated that the door will be designed such that it blends in with pleasant chatter and the occasional musical interlude.

He established his operation because he enjoys the everyday contact with the Queen's community. Accordingly, he conceived of the ice cream business as a means of profitably pursuing his pastime without becoming a member of the "UIC sunbathing team". His operation is an example of free-enterprise at its best.

Unfortunately, he encountered a major obstacle in his well-meaning but not overly remunerative (financially, that is) enterprise. One evening, as a result of either the carelessness or maliciousness of some individual, Alan's ice cream freezer was unplugged from the outlet it had been left in for the evening. Upon arriving to commence business the following morning, the distraught proprietor discovered himself to be the unhappy owner of approximately $120. worth of unsellable slush. At $14.50 for a 2 1/2 gallon container, ice cream is not cheap these days. Combined with the fact that he was unable to restock his freezer until the following week, Alan unfortunately lost approximately $70 worth of business, thereby reducing his meagre revenues by some $190.

Realizing the generous nature of Alan's many customers, a fund has been established to compensate him for his loss. Those who wish to contribute may leave a donation at the AMS general office this week between the hours of 8:30 and 12:00 a.m. or 1:00 and 4:00 p.m. There will also be a box for contributions outside the West Campus Pub from 8:30 to 11:00 p.m. Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday evenings this week.

Remember: kindness and consideration toward your fellow beings are their own reward!

one of the existing walls. As a result of the construction of this new door, the seating capacity of the pub will be raised to 85.

AMS protests to embassy

by Becky Boyce

The AMS council representatives have recently sent a telegram to the Russian Embassy in Ottawa in an attempt to show the distress of Queen's students over the secret trials of the dissident Anatoly Shcharansky.

"We want to show that students are concerned with more than their own issues and problems," says AMS President Dave Brown. "By showing that our interests are actually much broader, we will become much more credible when we do speak out on student-related issues."

So far there has been no feedback on the telegram aside from the coverage this weekend in the Whig Standard which Mr. Brown expressed as "very positive".

Campus Comment

by Stephen Zimmer
photos by Dave Brooks

This week, in Campus Comment, students were asked for their views concerning Faculty Houses (i.e. Grad House, and the proposed Commerce House).

Michelle Sokoloski, Education
Michelle felt that faculty could increase the housing problem in Kingston. However, as long as there is not a housing shortage, and the faculty houses are well-used, then such houses are "OK".

Peter Bark, Law '79

Peter believes that there is nothing wrong in having faculty houses. As the number of faculties on campus is not large, such houses would not create problems in the availability of housing. Faculty houses could also serve as places for socialization and relaxation. The campus pub does not provide an environment for social meeting and is more suited towards "letting off steam".

Jain Leggo, University of Guelph, Agricultural Microbiology, currently on staff at Public Health labs in Kingston.

Jain said that if there were too many faculty houses, it is possible that they could fractionate the university. Jain feels that the argument that faculty houses could create a housing shortage is poor, and that they do not provide a real drawback in this respect.

Shannon Lee Mannion, Arts '78
Faculty houses create "rank sectionalism" and serve to fractionate the university. Shannon believes that disassociation between the faculties has caused enough problems already, and cited the Faculty of Applied Science as one such faculty which has isolated itself. The University Centre provides all the facilities that are needed, and faculty houses would create additional unnecessary expense. Shannon was generally not in agreement with the concept of faculty houses. However she did not believe that faculty houses would add to the housing shortage, as houses in Kingston are already being "torn down for parking lots".

University Centre construction halted

by Becky Boyce

If you were anxious to try out those new steps that are going in in the front of the John Deutsch University Centre, you may be waiting a little longer than you expected. There is a carpenter's strike on and construction of the fourth and final phase of the complex is now at a standstill.

Norm Hart, General Manager

Norman Hart, General Manager of the University Centre, explained how the situation developed. He stated that the job had been tendered out to Friendship Construction Company earlier this year because it had been decided that this was more feasible than to do things through the University Physical Plant which lacked both the elaborate equipment necessary for the job as well as the summer manpower.

Consequently, Hart explained that it was "cheaper for the University to just sit and wait" despite the set-back caused by the strike. To take the job back from Friendship Construction and proceed with construction internally, Queen's would still be required to pay the company a premium charge.

"If the situation becomes critical so that we won't have the steps for the early part of the school year, we may have to think of an alternative," said Hart.

The renovations, which are now at the stage where the carpenters would be adding the cement molding for the steps, involve the installation of an additional front entrance to the Centre which will connect the basement directly with the outside. In previous years, everyone has had to come in the front door and down the stairs, or use either the University Avenue entrance or the one off Clergy Street. Hart feels the new entrance will greatly improve traffic flow through the Centre, as well as providing a handier exit for people seeking to pass through the basement during performances in the foyer.

"The original cost of the new entrance was estimated between $75,000 and $80,000, but with the less elaborate, scaled-down plans this cost has been reduced to $49,000," stated Hart.

The final phase of construction in the University Centre also entails the rebuilding of part of the University Avenue steps as well as the loading dock on Clergy Street where a garbage removal system is to be installed. Inside, the Camera Clubroom is undergoing renovations and one more clubroom is being built.

"But of course there will always be further renovations and redecorations going on throughout the Centre," Hart said.

AMS proposes several renovations to old houses

Staff

People living in AMS houses may rest easier next year thanks to a number of proposed renovations.

The AMS Housing Service, which acts as a landlord for the university-owned houses, plans to install smoke detectors in all houses and to replace old wooden window frames with permanent aluminum ones.

Ken McKenzie, manager of the Housing Service, said that there is also the possibility of conducting an insulation program to help cut down on fuel costs. However, he has not decided yet whether it would be more efficient to do a few houses each year or to insulate them all at once.

McKenzie will also look at three or four houses to determine whether larger-scale renovations should be performed.

The renovations will be financed by an accumulated surplus of housing service funds that has built up over the last five years. This surplus presently stands at approximately $30,000.

However, because repairs have not been made on a regular basis in the past, many houses need considerable improvement. Thus, the cost of renovating the 32 AMS houses may exceed the $30,000 surplus and may necessarily limit the number and extent of improvements that can be made.

John Koopman, AMS Vice-President (Operations) pointed out that the AMS board of directors has the final say as to whether the improvements will be made but he is confident they will give their approval.

Cutbacks campaign

by Anne Johnson

Queen's students will be the target of a concerted information campaign to inform them on the issue of financial cutbacks to post-secondary institutions.

This fall the AMS Inner Council will use several means to reach students, according to Hugh Dodd, External Affairs Commissioner. Pamphlets will be placed in the information envelopes sent out to the first year students, and booths may be set up in the registration lines. Tours of the residences are also planned.

"The most important facet of the campaign will be OSAP counselling," said Dodd in a recent interview. "Because of the changes made to the Student Assistance Plan, the Queen's awards office will be swamped with students asking for information and assistance, and the office will be glad of the extra help."

AMS Researcher Elinor Mahoney will set up the student counselling service.

In addition to the fall campaign said Dodd, the AMS will establish links with alumni and parents' associations "to emphasize how important the University is in a societal context. Alumni will be asked to help us encourage the government to reallocate its priorities towards post-secondary education," Dodd said.

The Ontario Federation of Students' priority this year will also be on the issue of cutbacks and that organization is planning a variety of programs and campaigns for the year in co-operation with student associations from most Ontario universities.

SWAPO, Vorster, and the Multinationals

The following is a continuation of a feature on SWAPO

by Kathleen Orr

Prime Minister Vorster of South Africa must deal constantly with a dilemma. He needs and receives a great deal of economic support from the western countries; better international relations would help him immensely. He must appear to be reasonably open to political progress, hoping to maintain good economic relations and to lessen the threat of international interference. On the other hand, his forces have a strong stand in northern Namibia, and Vorster appears very unwilling to leave the country which he has been illegally occupying for so long. He seems determined to stay in Namibia, and to help fight against the Angolan government. These two objectives seriously conflict with his objective of detente within and without his country. While Vorster depends on the multinational corporations of the western countries for economic stability, he must also maintain the whites' position of economic superiority.

Vorster's "detente" has consisted of various changes in the laws which make the blacks' living conditions appear freer. Pass laws were repealed, but all blacks still carry residential permits and must produce them on demand. Marriage laws were repealed, but residential areas are still segregated.

Attempts have been made to get support from the Namibians themselves, in order to combat SWAPO and similar political parties; and to quell the guerrilla activity. By creating a white nationalist party in Namibia, the South African government has bought off African chiefs and leaders who either need or want money, and has formed them into puppet governments controlled by the whites. The South African government has also created propaganda for the white government, making it appear liberal in its attitudes towards blacks. However, the inequalities still exist. Economic statistics are the clearest indication that Vorster's detente merely changes the appearance of the laws, but not their effects.

The issue of Canadian investment in South Africa has come up time and time again, in both our own House of Commons and in the United Nations. In December of 1977, Don Jamieson, Secretary of State for External Affairs, stated that Canadian sponsored commercially supported activities would be withdrawn from South Africa to show our condemnation of the apartheid policy. This, however, only applied to government sponsored activities. Private corporations, such as Hudson's Bay, Bata, Noranda, Alcan Aluminum, Ford Motor Co., Maclean-Hunter Ltd., Massey-Ferguson, Inco, Ltd., Cominco Ltd., and others, are all directly or indirectly investing in South Africa and/or Namibia. The Hudson's Bay Company, for example, is selling expensive wool coats for $3,000 to $4,000 abroad, using wool which they get relatively cheaply in Namibia, because of the low wages.

There is a high white ownership of valuable property, and they hold most of the wealth within the country. For this reason, the home governments of these multinationals have a great deal to lose if the multinationals are forced to leave. They want things kept peaceful. Vorster wants to maintain a military stronghold to protect his own investment in the country. SWAPO has little to lose and a great deal to gain in their view by removing all outside control from the country. These motives should be kept in mind when considering developments in the "negotiations" which are currently taking place.

The Home governments of these multinationals are involved in the negotiations between South Africa and SWAPO. Since the U.N. has recognized SWAPO as a leader within Namibia, it is sensible for SWAPO to be in on the negotiations. The progress in negotiations has been slow, because they often break down over a few key issues.

First, the U.N. Declaration article 385 states that free, private elections in an independent Namibia will be under U.N. supervision to avoid the danger of the fear of South African forces influencing the voters. SWAPO wants all South African forces out of the country, and the assistance of U.N. peacekeeping forces if necessary. Vorster wants 3000 men to remain in Namibia, and to retain the bases at Grootfontein and Oshivello, and the eight forward installations in the North where terrorism is most prominent.

Vorster wants to retain troops in the area because of its proximity to the Angolan border and its relatively high population.

Another key issue is Walvis Bay. Walvis Bay is the only deep-water port on the Namibian coast, and is therefore crucial to Namibia's international trade. The port offers ready access to Windhoek, the capital of Namibia. It is essential that an independent Namibia have this port.

The South African claim to the port is based on the fact that the port area is a British inheritance rather than an ex-mandate from the League of Nations. There also happens to be a naval base, and a military communications camp near the port; so that in the event that Namibia did achieve her independence the South Africans could still control the country.

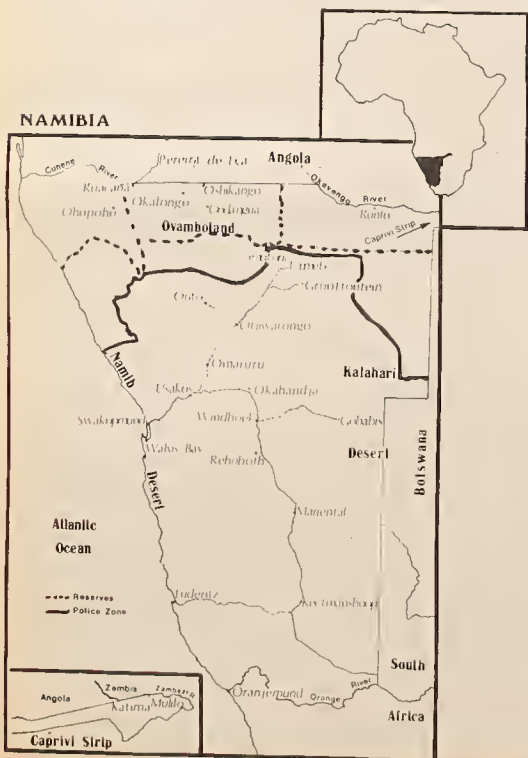

Vorster appears to be giving in to Namibia in the negotiations. He accepted the Western proposals with certain conditions; first that elections would be initially controlled by South Africa, secondly, that South Africa could keep Walvis Bay, and thirdly, that they could maintain some troops in the northern area of Namibia.

By 'giving up' Namibia and withdrawing some forces, Vorster seems to play the game of drawing the line just short of what SWAPO and the U.N. would find acceptable.

Whatever the outcome of the negotiations, the possibility of peace seems unlikely, because of the motives of the negotiators. There does not seem to be an 'impartial' actor because each of them has something to gain, and something to lose.

Sculpture Out Of Doors

Agnes displays Canadian work

photos by Dave Brooks

The ground of the Queen's University campus in front of Kingston General Hospital are, at present, the Scene for "Sculpture out of Doors". "Sculpture" is a display of abstract sculpture by eight Canadian artists. Although the exhibit features artwork from a number of provinces, it is not intended to be representative of sculpture across Canada. Instead, it is meant to permit Kingstonians to view the work of artists who may or may not be known in this area.

Linda Milrod, curatorial assistant of the Agnes Etherington Art Centre, conceived the idea for this event a year ago. The choice of exhibitors was not necessarily based on how well-known their works are. Linda also chose artists on the basis of her personal preferences toward their work.

Two of the sculptors are local - both Alan Dickson and David Pickering are currently on staff with Queens' Department of Art (Incidentally, Dickson also created the sculptures in front of Jeffrey Hall). The others are from Quebec, Nova Scotia, British Columbia, and other parts of Ontario.

Of all the artists involved in the show, Andre Fauteux is probably best known. Fauteux's work has been featured in several exhibitions in Toronto, as well as in London, Paris, and New York. All of the contributing artists have displayed their creations at exhibitions held in Canada and in other countries.

All of the sculptures displayed, with the exception of that of Roland Poulin, are property of the artists themselves. Poulin's sculpture, which is on loan from the National Gallery of Ottawa, presents an optical illusion based on shape and the concept of being "level". Poulin's display is somewhat unique, as few sculptors from Quebec have displayed their work outside the province.

Many of the artists assembled their creations directly on the site of the exhibition. The assembly of Edward Zelenak's massive sculpture was probably the most formidable of all. Constructed of fibreglass and coated with iron particles, the structure weighed approximately four tons. The sculpture was brought to the site on two flatbed trucks, and required four men and a crane for its assembly.

Two examples of sculpture on display.....

Ms. Milrod explained that many people have stopped by to view the sculptures, and that the majority of comments concerning the exhibition were positive. This is not to say that the sculptures did not draw negative opinions - in fact, Linda emphasized that people are entitled to express their own opinions, negative as well as positive.

Although I was not particularly impressed by the sculptures on display, I felt that one was especially interesting. This was "Strongbow", by Gregory Snider Strongbow, a powerful combination of Douglas fir and chain, blends well with its place of display behind Theological Hall. Snider himself has not actually seen the finished product. Although he built the pieces, the sculpture itself was assembled by a fabricator. For those of you who are budget conscious, I might add that Queen's University was not responsible for the funding of this exhibition. Grants were obtained from the Canada Council and the Ontario Arts Council.

So, if you have some free time, why not drop into the Agnes Etherington Centre, pick up a brochure, and see what "Sculpture out of Doors" has to offer? If you don't like what you see, don't worry, as the exhibition concludes on August 20th (Fear not! The tobogganing hill is saved!). If, on the other hand, you'd like to see more, you can also rest assured, as Linda hopes to hold another outdoor show next year.

Pyramid: Alan Parson's new concept

"Pyramid" is dealing with the cult of Pyramid Power

by Paul Seay

In the Spring of this year Alan Parson released his third Project Under the title of 'Pyramid', this third Project differs considerably from his two earlier ones in that it remains laid-back throughout, with a great deal of orchestration enhancing the quiet mood of the Project.

The Alan Parsons Project was born in 1975 under the direction of Eric Woolfson. Woolfson was a great admirer of the works of Edgar Allan Poe, and along with Parsons and Andrew Powell, created their first Project dealing with Poe. The following year (1977) they released their second Project dealing not with literature, but with man-made machines. Both of these Projects had much in common, foremost the music. The albums became known for their constant beats, orchestration and choral arrangements (under Powell), and the excellent engineering of Parsons.

However, the third Project, although focusing on a particular idea like the other two Projects, is quite different musically. Only once in the whole Project does the familiar sound of the previous two Projects emerge. Otherwise, the entire album is a new sound altogether from the three men.

Yet, 'Pyramid' is dealing with the cult of Pyramid Power. By making the music more quiet, Parsons and Woolfson are able to concentrate on their lyrics through which the listener becomes aware of the possibilities of Pyramid Power and perhaps its dangers. Over all, the album takes on an ominous sound in relation to the lyrics which makes Pyramid Power sound like something from the occult. Nevertheless, 'Pyramid' is another fine attempt by Parsons, Woolfson and Powell to convert an idea into music. The music is good, the lyrics introspective and imaginative, and the engineering superb as it is with the other two Projects. The only question that arises now is what will the three men that form The Alan Parsons Project put into music next? The release of 'Pyramid' has shown that The Alan Parsons Project can be quite versatile musically, yet remain within the original guidelines of the first and second Projects by choosing a subject and converting it to music.

Heaven Can Wait exhibits Beatty's talents

by Chris Capp

The updating of old films is as important to Hollywood film products as the "new improved" label is to most other consumer items. We've been introduced to new-improved versions of A Star Is Born, The Big Sleep and most recently to Warren Beatty's remake of the 1941 classic comedy, Here Comes Mr. Jordan; it's a glossy package called Heaven Can Wait. Unlike its puffed-up counterparts, Beatty's efforts (as producer, co-director, co-writer and star) have created a film that is brilliant in itself.

Perhaps the biggest reason for the film's success is the way in which editing and dialogue combine for unexpected and explosive comic impact. When Beatty and Julie Christie ponder over the traumas of love, quick cuts to the eavesdropping chauffeur add a hilarious new dimension to the intent of the dialogue. The light side of things is always present. Based on the fantastic and wonderfully absurd premise of life-after-death body switching, the film's plot is ripe for the 'mistaken identity' use of characters. Beatty plays the part of three men: a Super Bowl crazed quarter back, Joe Pendleton, come alive as millionaire Leo Farnsworth, come alive again as a Super Bowl quarterback for the final minutes of the Super Bowl. Needless to say, Pendleton pulls out a win for the LA Rams in the end.

Often the film lapses into more brazen forms of undermining the dialogue, other than editing. Scenes in which the millionaire's wife (Dyan Cannon) and his private executive secretary plot to murder him are set in ridiculous surroundings. The overall effect of their clandestine talks, be they wedged in amidst bright green shruberies or as they lie like pieces of meat stuffed between seeming endless acres or gaudily patterned bedsheets, is one of visual silliness. In this the film's tone of humour is more akin to Monty Python or the Carry on series than to traditional forms of American cinema comedy.

It is the presence of Mr. Jordan, the Heavenly business manager that places the film squarely within the genre of American screwball comedy. His unexpected arrivals in Joe Pendleton's newly acquired 'life' as a millionaire causes no end of confusion among servants and houseguests alike. Jordan is invisible to everyone except Pendleton (sounds familiar) and Pendleton's babbling is mistaken for the outward expression of a brain that has gone a bit soft.

If nothing else, Heaven Can Wait is one of those film experiences that you don't mind paying for; its light and its unbelievable and its entertaining. It may not be all that new and improved, but it works.

Troupe presents summer theatre

Kingston Community Players and Sexual Perversity

Every summer thousands of students apply for Canada Council grants for funds that will enable them to engage in self realizing projects not all are accepted. Nancy Watson's project, however, is a thriving and entertaining Kingston residents in a variety of locations. Julian Cunningham reviews their latest show and provides an insight into the troupe's philosophy.

by Julian Cunningham

On July 19th, a short addenda attached to a poster in Kingston's New Public Library read, "Warning: Certain Language May Be Offensive." Despite the warning, a young and enthusiastic audience crowded into the library's Wilson Room to see David Mamet's biting satire, Sexual Perversity in Chicago, presented by members of the Kingston Community Players, in repertory company operating for the summer on a Young Canada Works grant of $18,000.

This play is one of nine shows developed by the troupe for presentation at various institutions, schools and for the general public in the Kingston area.

Their material is without exception contemporary. Nancy Watson, the project manager, explained: "It makes you realize how much this is needed in Kingston. We must open the public's eyes to more contemporary shows."

Sexual Perversity certainly demonstrated a willingness in the troupe to realize this imperative. They provided a slick and energetic representation of Mamet's blatantly vulgar and irresistibly humorous look at today's declining sexual morals.

The play explores the relationship of a young couple, Deborah and Dan (played by Judith Thompson and David Crean), who meet in a singles' bar, and begin to find a life together. But the impressionable Dan falls prey to the antagonism of his best friend Bernie (Jon Frizzell), an obsessive and flamboyant teller of tall sexual tales, who rejects Dan's growing intimacy with Deborah, imploring him to return to the life of "one-night stands", porn flicks and freedom.

Deborah is affected in the same way by the morose and bitter orations of her friend Joan (Ann Holloway), a school teacher with a marked distaste for men. Their fragile affair is shattered by the base vulgarity of the peripheral characters and both Dan and Deborah regress to their former roles of sexual one-upmanship and desperate need under a thin veil of crude humor.

The play is a series of vignettes, occurring in over ten settings, including two apartments, a singles' bar, a beach, a classroom and even limbo!

"The diversity in scenes intrigued us," explained director Paul McGlashan, who faced the taxing demands of Mamet's complex script.

The resulting performance was a qualified success.

The actors were required to move from scene to scene in full view of the audience. This occasionally proved rather distracting, and perhaps alternate methods for scene changes should have been considered.

The focal points of the tiny stage were the singles' bar and the bedroom, where Dan and Deborah met and parted, respectively. The bedroom scenes were played on the floor, where the actors were visible only to the first two rows of spectators.

Certain discrepancies in the use of props were irritating. Water was used to represent a fancy drink in one scene, whereas an actress chomped on an invisible roll in another. The indecision in using real or mimed props was unnecessary and distracting.

Unquestionably though, the strength of any production is its characters, and this small cast injected vivid imagination into the development of each role. Ann Holloway brought disturbing life to the character of Joan, the cynical and dissatisfied school teacher. The subtle hints of lesbianism in Joan throughout the play, revealed the depth and precision of Miss Holloway's performance. Opposing her was Judith Thompson as Deborah, who gave the show its most powerful moment, an impassioned argument with Dan in defense of their relationship. Miss Thompson is an accomplished performer who achieves emotional extremes with great economy of effort.

Jon Frizzell's boisterous Bernie was the heart of the play's humour, though his prominence in the play often overshadowed the central conflict between Dan and Deborah. Either a weakness in direction or a misinterpretation by the actor caused Bernie to be out of proportion with the other actors, and eventually a deterrent to the more central concerns of the play. All the vulnerability and lack of self-assurance in Dan were ably brought to life by David Crean. He demonstrated with quiet authority the trappings and eventual regression of his character from a growing love to a stagnant wasteland of flesh.

Sexual Perversity suffered from many technical weaknesses, but the skill and intensity of the acting made ample compensation for this; the main reason why it received such a rousing ovation from the full house it played to Wednesday night.

Nancy summed up the reaction the troupe has received from its various performances. "Great." She wants to return in the fall, to the penitentiaries where the troupe has already played, to do more shows with interested students.

"People are so happy to see you. We get letters from the inmates thanking us for coming."

The Kingston Community Players have two public performances remaining: a children's show, July 25 (today) in the Wilson Room of the New Public Library, Johnson and Bagot streets, at 2:00pm; and Not Enough Rope, a "suicidal" comedy featuring Anne McMahon, Sue Williamson, Jamie Agar, with Nancy Watson directing, also in the Wilson Room August 2nd at 7:00pm. Don't miss them.

At the end of the interview, Miss Watson looked over with conviction and said, "I hope this is continued next year." We hope so too, Nancy.

Coming and Going

The Ontario government has found another way to deal with the "problem" of ever expanding enrolment in post-secondary institutions. This method could perhaps best be described as elimination by omission.

This Ontario government, and its federal counterpart, has failed completely in coming to grips with the major problem of youth employment both in this province and in the country as a whole.

Ontario, although it is the richest province in Canada, can now boast of the second worst unemployment rate among youth in the country.

Six thousand of the young people presently unemployed had intended to conduct studies at universities and colleges this fall. They have now been forced to alter their plans as they can no longer afford to attend.

For three or four years now the Ontario Federation of Students has advocated the implementation of a large-scale direct job creation programme. While the Experience '78 program has been a step in the right direction, it is not comprehensive enough, the vast majority of students work only for minimum wage and the program does not always run through the entire summer. Much more must be done in this area to ensure that youth have a choice of whether they wish to attend post-secondary institutions.

But perhaps the provincial government has not been so inactive. After all, Dr. Parrott introduced this past year a new student aid plan. One long-awaited change was the recognition of students' real summer earnings (or lack of them) when assessing the value of their award.

Furthermore, the Ministry of Colleges and Universities has maintained a minimum summer savings requirement of $800. The Ministry makes use of a somewhat complex formula to determine a student's expected summer savings. Under this formula, a student would have to work at least sixteen weeks at a rate of pay no less than $3.75 per hour in order to meet this minimum requirement.

If a student fails to meet this savings requirement he may appeal his award, but only if he is armed with a battery of paper justifying virtually every summer expense.

I love baseball. But then again,
I like watching the sun rise in the Journal office.

The Minister responsible for this program belongs to the same government which introduced a modest, at best, job creation program, paying a full dollar under the calculated minimum needed to make the summer saving requirement of OSGP. McU is holding that student responsible for the difference between his calculated summer savings and the minimum requirement even though that Ministry calculates that he could not have saved that amount, further the government of which that Ministry is part does not pay the amount calculated to yield the minimum summer savings requirement for those who wish to attend university next fall.

They have us coming and going.

Vida Blue hottest part of baseball summer

by Chris Chenoweth

Baseball fever is at a pitch in the hot days of July.

Pennants are won and lost in these stretch drives of summer. Some clubs play streaky ball—such as the Boston Red Sox, always on hot winning streaks in late July—while other teams seem traditionally content to make their moves in late August. The K.C. Royals and the N.Y. Yankees are always the big ball teams to watch in August; last year both teams virtually won their pennants in August with the Yankees winning 20 of 26, and the Royals grabbing an amazing 23 of 27 contests that season.

This summer the season is finding two clubs on top of their divisions exactly as last year, and the Boston Red Sox are making a mockery of the American East, despite the antics of Reggie Jackson, Billy Martin and company.

But the biggest surprise of the '78 season has to be the consistency and winning ways of the resurgent San Francisco Giants.

Seemingly doomed a year ago to lose its National League franchise, the Giants in a single trade brought the fans back to the ballpark to see a winner. That trade, of course, was the Vida Blue trade.

Not since the days when Dick Selma of the Cubs used to serve as unofficial cheerleader (while he wasn't pitching relief) have fans seen such enthusiasm from a ballplayer like Vida Blue. Blue just doesn't clap his hands during games, he stomps and hollers hometown fans into a frenzy.

"I'm really glad to be in San Francisco," Blue recently told a writer. "It wasn't fun to play for Oakland last year—our big years were over, and Mr. Charlie Finley was making the clubhouse miserable. I feel like I have a new lease on life here in 'Frisco," the All-Star pitcher admitted.

The Giants are also enjoying the love affair with their new ace southpaw.

The club is holding a three game lead over the Cincinnati Reds and the L.A. Dodgers at presstime, the best showing the Giants have made since they won the Western pennant last in 1971.

And it doesn't look like the Giants are expecting to choke under the pressures of the stretch drive.

"Vida's experience as a winner has got the whole club believing it can go all the way," said third baseman Bill Madlock, himself a two time batting champ while with the Chicago Cubs. "I think we will stay on top 'cause we're hungrier than L.A. or the Reds."

With the enthusiasm and pitching performances given by new Giant pitcher Vida Blue, it looks like the Giants might finally find love from the fans of San Francisco.

AMS buses running to major cities

by Chris Hall

Students may be able to afford to go home more often this year if an AMS proposal to establish its own bus service proves to be economically feasible.

The bus service, tentatively entitled "the Tricolour Express" was conceived to provide a cheaper form of travel for students going to Ottawa, Toronto, or Montreal.

"The main reason for the service is that we can offer ticket prices at half the commercial rates," said Dave Brown, AMS President.

However, with the increase in taxi fares to the Kingston railway station as an additional expense for traveling students, the proposed bus service becomes even more attractive.

John Koopman, AMS Vice-President (Operations), is presently finalizing negotiations with a major Canadian bus company to rent air-conditioned and bathroom-equipped coaches for the Queen's bus service.

"We want to make it clear that we are not renting school buses but luxury coaches," said Koopman.

The service will initially be run on a two week trial basis. For Friday September 22nd and Friday September 29th, the service will run to Toronto only.

"Fares will be set to cover operating costs with some factor to cover the cost of empty seats," added Brown.

"If we sell any tickets the buses will go. This is different than past attempts to set up a student-run transportation service. These buses are guaranteed to run."

The buses will depart Kingston from in front of the Student Union on Union Street and will drop off people near the bus station in Toronto. The return bus will pick up riders in front of the Royal York Hotel on Front Street at 6:30 p.m. on Sunday.

Tickets will be sold on a round trip basis only. The price has been set at $12.50.

Year to year, some things never change

Frosh week;

So far, so good

by Tom Mohr

It's too early to be sure, but the initial indications are that this year's Orientation Week will be free of major problems, yet as spirited as it has always been. Unlike other years, there have been no serious complaints from either Kingston residents or mistreated freshmen thus far.

Craig Rogers, an Arts '82 student just in from hometown Toronto, has no complaints about either the organization or the treatment.

"Well, I've just been taking it all in. You know, the tours, the Oil Thighs, the socializing. Right now I'm just getting socialized." When asked to elaborate, he added, "This week is the only time I'll be able to party."

Rogers considers the organization to be adequate, and the activities to be worthwhile. He expressed certain regrets that the Arts and Science faculty, due to its size, was unable to invoke the kind of unified spirit characteristic of first-year Commerce and Engineering faculties.

"When you're in Commerce, you go through hell together. That brings you together. In Arts, we're just too big for that. Arts has the most kids, you know," he said.

Janice Nicholls, Chairman of the Commerce Orientation Committee, agreed that this year's program for Commerce '82 is spirited.

"We are trying to develop spirit in Commerce '82. This is being done by pitting one year against another. It's sort of, here we are in '81, and we're going to cream you so you'd better get together and protect yourself. It's very much a psychological thing," he said.

The Commerce orientation program seeks first to instill loyalty in the year, then loyalty in the faculty, and finally in the Queen's community. Miss Nicholls feels this must be done by instilling a need for protection and togetherness. The boss-frosh relationship creates this need, she claims. Because first-year Commerce students are not faced with many academic decisions,

New taxi zones may lead to over-charging

by Anne Johnson

Students travelling home by train will be in for a shock when they pay their taxi driver at Kingston's CN station, this fall.

Due to a new city bylaw, four taxi zones were added which serve to increase most fares by at least 50c. A ride from Queen's University Center to the train station will now cost $4.00 instead of the previous $2.75 fare.

Some drivers have been taking advantage of unsuspecting customers however. Several complaints have been lodged with the AMS by students forced to pay $5.00 for a ride home from the train.

John Comeau of Modern Taxi admitted, "There are drivers out there that will overcharge if people are gullible enough to pay it, but that's their problem."

The company is trying to eliminate abuse of the new rates said Comeau, but he also noted it will continue unless the company is informed of possible violations.

Comeau suggested that if a customer feels he has been overcharged he should request that the driver ask the dispatcher to quote the price, or take the driver's number and report him to the police or dispatcher.

"We have on occasion made the driver return the complete fare in cases of extreme overcharging," said Comeau.

He emphasized the best solution was to become aware of the zone lines and the prices.

AMS President Dave Brown has responded to complaints by sending for zoning maps and fare information which will be on file in the AMS office.

"Other than this, there's not much we can do since the rates are set by the police commission," said Brown.

The extra zones were added when a recent bid to have Kingston's taxis outfitted with meters failed. The new prices, said Comeau, are competitive with meter fares.

Kingston Police Chief Gerald Rice recently admitted that problems with the new zones are foreseeable, but that the new system is an improvement over the previous one.

A Queen's summer

News Analysis

Year of the showdown?

by Tom Mohr

Summer is over. For the Government of Ontario, summer could not have come at a better time. In March, the largest student demonstration in Canada's history was staged to protest the government's plans to institute dramatic cutbacks in student funding. At that time, it appeared the snowball of student opinion had finally begun to roll, and eventually—surely—the government would be forced to give in and re-direct its student aid program.

Graduate students, faced with the prospect of a blanket withdrawal of all grants, were up in arms. University administrations were clamouring about the human cost of government financial restraint. Committees, student and faculty groups waving the "Fight Cutbacks" banner sprung up across the province.

Just as the political pressure began to intensify, final exams hit Ontario. The Fight Cutbacks movement ground temporarily to a halt.

Premier Davis and Harry Parrott had planned well. While holding extensive press conferences, cabinet meetings and university visits starting in September of '77 and running throughout the school year, the vital specifics of the new student aid program were not made public until the Ontario Federation of Students leaked them to the Globe and Mail on March 7.

In effect, then, students could only see the barest outlines of the new OSAP program until very late in the school year. When the specific figures and their implications were finally made known to the public, the end of classes was just weeks away. Though Parrott and Davis could not have expected such a great surge of opposition from Ontario students as took place this past spring, their careful timing served to keep the bud of discontent from reaching legislative fruition in a more acceptable, but more expensive,

The March 16 rally did represent a significant step forward for students, regardless of the temporary damper summer has placed on the movement.

Students suddenly realized, as they paraded before the front door of the legislative building, that they had common concerns, and could present a unified front in expressing them.

The potent question remains as to whether this communality of purpose can be rekindled this fall. Are returning students still motivated to seek changes in the Government's student aid policy?

A new bone of contention has recently surfaced in the appointment of Bette Stephenson to two portfolios, one being Ministry of Colleges and Universities (Harry Parrott is off to Environment). With a brand new, and some feel flawed, student aid program getting its first test in the field, Premier Davis has chosen to divide Stephenson's attention between MCO and Education. Many Ontario students may soon be wondering what kind of representation they can expect from this overburdened cabinet minister.

Further, the prospects for significant headway being made with Stephenson are small. During her tenure as Minister of Labour, she was known as a hard-nosed arbitrator who never strayed from the Government line. She is not likely to be an effective voice for student opinion in cabinet circles.

The coming academic year will either be the year of the showdown or the year of the slowdown. Translated, students will either be able to rejuvenate themselves and confront the government once and for all on a number of unanswered questions, or they will perceive the obstructions to change as too great and simply accept their bread and water. As they say, only time will tell.

Canoeing accident

Tragedy touches Queen's

by Tom Mohr

Mark Denny will never fulfill his life-long goal of becoming a master at St. John's School for Boys in Claremont, Ontario. Nor is he rejoining his friends this fall at Queen's.

Mark was a victim of this summer's Lake Tamiskaming tragedy, in which twelve youngsters and one instructor from St. John's perished while on a canoeing trip in Northern Quebec.

On June 11, four canoes, including one led by Mark and one by Richard Bird, a Queen's Business professor, encountered rough weather while out on the lake. The heavy winds and choppy water capsized first one canoe, then another, and then a third as what began as a routine rescue operation went awry.

By nightfall, twelve students and one instructor had drowned. Mark Denny was the instructor. Rescuers found Mark's body and that of a student tied to an overturned canoe, still afloat.

Pat Flanagan, a close friend of Mark's and graduate of St. John's, indicated that when the storm hit, Mark's canoe was second to overturn.

As the tragedy unfolded and two more canoes capsized, Mark remained in the numbingly cold water, slowly losing strength. When it became clear that he would be unable to reach shore, he swam to an overturned canoe, and tied first an unconscious youngster, then himself to the side in hope of remaining above water. He then passed out. High waves and cold water took his life, Flanagan said.

Mark had led a quiet life while at Queen's. A Commerce student preparing to enter his third year, he had largely kept away from the activities of university.

"He just wasn't into the Queen's community at all. I don't think he thought that a university education would accomplish all that much; he had his future planned for him. He wanted to get into teaching at St. John's. University was a chance to take some time off before he became a teacher," Flanagan said.

Mark's death and the circumstances surrounding it have not embittered his family in their attitude towards St. John's. Both his sister and mother (Mark's father died seven years ago) have expressed their confidence in the judgement used by the school in preparing for the outing, Flanagan indicated.

"A lot of good is going to come out of this tragedy. More people are aware of the school and its purpose, and it's been flooded with calls and telegrams from all around the world. The school is going to grow out of this, and become better for it," he added.

The flag above Queen's Convocation Hall was flown at half mast in Mark's memory.

Queen's raises millions

"Queen's Quest", the campaign to raise money for the university was officially begun in January of this year. Already, nearly three-quarters of the goal of $10 million have been raised. Much of the funds were provided through projects undertaken during the summer.

Solid support of Queen's Quest by students, staff and faculty has greatly encouraged external donors to contribute to the university's current fund-raising campaign says Queen's University Principal Ronald L. Watts.

Last Friday Dr. Watts met with the Queen's Staff Association to receive a $1,300 cheque raised through an arts and crafts bazaar and a sale of smoke detectors. Close to 100 staff members donated handmade articles to the crafts sale held in the John Deutsch University Centre.

In thanking the Association members Dr. Watts stressed how important the support of the university community figures in the overall success of the five-year, $10 million campaign. "After only nine months almost three-quarters of the campaign's goal has been realized," said Dr. Watts.

"An impressive portion of that total has come from the university. Earlier this year a faculty-staff canvass produced $512,000 in pledges while students voted to contribute $750,000 to Queen's Quest."

Staff Association President, Peter Scott, presented the cheque to Dr. Watts with the promise of more when the association will hold another crafts sale and a raffle in November.

The University will use the funds to improve library services; upgrade scientific and technical equipment; renovate buildings and facilities; strengthen research and academic development; and provide financial aid to students.

Along with the support of students, faculty and staff, the campaign is receiving impressive contributions from alumni, parents, corporations, foundations and other friends of Queen's.

A day-long geophysical survey in northern Ontario turned into a five-day test of survival for Queen's student Anna Bivi, 19, this summer.

On August 17, she and Winston Mottley, 37, a geology student at U of T, were dropped off at a lake about 100 kilometres north-east of Cochrane by a Natural Resources Ministry helicopter with only a light lunch and no survival gear. When the helicopter returned to pick them up later in the day, the two could not be found.

An extensive search was mounted involving two teams of tracking dogs, five helicopters and fifty searchers from the police and the Natural Resources Ministry. It was to no avail. Miss Bivi and Mr. Mottley eventually found their way to a remote bush road and hailed down a passing motorist. The couple ate berries to sustain themselves during their five-day ordeal in the bush.

Miss Bivi is presently entering her second year.

Journal co-editor Gord Howe will not be returning to Queen's this year, as he has been forced to withdraw for academic reasons. Chris Hall, the remaining co-editor has agreed to temporarily assume full responsibility for the position.

Howe had been elected treasurer of the Ontario Federation of Students, a position he has had to resign, since only the chairperson can be a non-student.

By telephoning prospective students in an effort to convince them to enrol at Carleton, Carleton University violated the guidelines of the Council of Ontario Universities.

The guidelines of the COU state that universities must not explicitly or implicitly provide offers of admission or scholarship to students in advance of the prescribed dates. It was suggested that the phone calls could be misinterpreted by the students as offers of admission.

Carleton's other tactics included a tour of high schools by university representatives to establish personal contacts, and an all-expense paid luncheon at Carleton for Ottawa area high school principals and counsellors.

Although the COU established its guidelines in 1973, it has been unable to prosecute universities for failing to follow the guidelines. However, because the number of violations by universities has increased, the Council is planning to establish a committee to police the actions of Ontario universities.

Queen's Assistant Registrar, D. Ellis, stated that Queen's has not yet had to use a hard sell technique to get students.

Fear of an outbreak of polio led to the vaccination of thousands of Kingston residents this past summer.

It was believed by authorities that Canada was free of this crippling disease. But after outbreaks in the prairie provinces and western Ontario, public immunization began.

Due to the large crowds and a limited supply of vaccine, immunization had to be restricted to those under 18 and the elderly. In mid-August, about 100 residents came into contact with a carrier and were placed on a 3-day quarantine after being given oral vaccines.

relative to other faculties, there is time to fully develop this spirit.

Arts and Science orientation this year is taking a completely different tack. Cliff McCracken, in charge of communications for the ASUS Orientation Committee, wants to emphasize individual development right from the start.

"Our goal is to stress individuality, because that's the way Arts is. You aren't in the same courses necessarily, as in Commerce or Engineering, so this individual perspective is what we try to instill in Frosh week," he said.

He also pointed out that Arts '82 frosh seem to be extremely enthusiastic.

"Their enthusiasm seems to be inversely related to the weather," McCracken said.

Gary Davis, Chairman of the Engineering Orientation Committee, feels that the Engineering orientation has changed a lot in the past few years. While still considered to be the most spirited of the three main programs, many of the cruder elements have been altered.

"There's been a change of image over the past few years or so. The orientation has become more conscious of the growing presence of women in the faculty. We've tempered certain aspects of our program in that regard," Davis said.

A large number of new faces at Queen's are transfer students, those who have come to Queen's after having completed some of their university education elsewhere. Transfer students this year are greater in number than first-year Commerce.

An effort has been made this fall to orient these students to Queen's with a greater consideration of the needs of a transfer student. Peter McCue, a member of the Transfer Students Orientation Committee and a transfer student himself, notes that most Queen's Trash '82 (the name for transfer frosh) have already gone through initiation at their previous schools and are more interested in academic counselling.

Greg Goodall is a Trash Collector, the equivalent of a boss, gael or freck. He did not wholly agree with McCue's assessment. "Just wait for the football game," he said.

Complaints about certain orientation activities have been received from Kingston residents, according to Paul Sobanski, the AMS Orientation Committee Chairman. But most have been of a minor nature, he added.

"There's just generally a lot of noise that people don't like. And some people take exception to having their cars surrounded with frosh singing Oil Thighs. But nothing serious has come up yet," Sobanski said.

Frosh pay debt

SPECIAL

In the past, the actions of a minority of Queen's students during Orientation Week have come under fire from residents of the city. This year, however, the students hope to make amends by becoming involved in a number of projects to help the Kingston community and local charities.

Approximately 200 first year students from the Faculty of Applied Science, dressed in their traditional tams, tartan skirts, and white T-shirts (reading "Dumb Frosh") will be canvassing the city. The Frosh will be selling peanuts to raise money for Rotary-sponsored programs. The proceeds, which are expected to amount to $8,000, will go towards RKY Camp and crippled children.

Once again, first year Arts and Science students will be shining shoes to raise money for the Canadian Cystic Fibrosis Foundation.

Arts frosh will also be working to aid Camp Outlook and Amnesty International. On Thursday, from 9am to 5pm, car-washes will be held at West End Gulf Service, Wes Reid's Esso, The Sunoco Self-Serve on Bath Road, and Gene Pelow Texaco.

Evening classzzzz...

Staff

Whether you are a political hopeful, aspiring playwright, or a health enthusiast, Queen's University has an evening course this fall to appeal to you.

There are more than 70 evening courses in 20 subject areas. Some of the courses are as basic as the geography of Canada, as practical as the sociology of Canada, and as topical as contemporary popular music.

A non-credit, no fees or registration course is being offered by the German department again this year. The course is for beginners who are interested in learning conversational German.

Other departments offering courses include political studies, drama, pharmacology, religion, philosophy, and sociology.

The majority of evening courses are full credits running two terms - September to April - and costing $140 each. Half courses which begin in September and January cost $70.

Students wishing to attend lectures but not submit written assignments or take examinations may audit courses for a $26 fee with permission of the instructor.

On August 18th, Ontario Premier William Davis introduced his second major cabinet shuffle in eight months.

The shuffle was necessitated by growing pressure surrounding two ministers, George MacCague and Reuben Baetz.

Harry Parrott, formerly Minister of Colleges and Universities in Ontario, has taken over as Minister of Environment and Dr. Bette Stephenson, formerly Minister of Labour, has replaced him. Stephenson will also hold the portfolio of Minister of Education, replacing Thomas Wells. Premier Davis himself was the last minister to hold the two portfolios.

Stephenson's appointment to two portfolios did not come as a surprise. She has gained a considerable reputation for toughness and strength in defending government policies against the opposition.

Created to establish "broader academic contact between staff and students" the Deans' Table will be a series of informal luncheon meetings of small staff-student groups.

The concept was the brainchild of Professor B.C. Robertson of the Physics Department who took the idea to the AMS for sponsorship. AMS President Dave Brown spent a considerable amount of time and energy drafting up several proposed guidelines and interviewing Deans. "I've been impressed with the incredible enthusiasm expressed by Deans and faculty members I've spoken to," said Brown.

Interested students will state on application forms the faculty of the staff they wish to have lunch with, then staff and students will meet at reserved tables in the McLaughlin Room. The program is under the auspices of the various Deans and being invited "doesn't necessarily mean you'll have lunch with a Dean." Brown observed. The staff involved will include academic staff, interested administrators as well as support staff. In order to keep costs of the program down participants will be expected to pay for their own meals.

Brown feels the Dean's Table will "revive the spirit of the University Centre", for in its original conception the Quiet Pub was seen as a possible meeting place for faculty and students.

Pam Lambert, the student coordinator of the Dean's Table will be responsible for the weekly execution of the event.

The size of the tables at the Quiet Pub will probably limit the number at each table to four, either two professors and two students or one professor and three students Lambert said. At present it is planned to have six tables meet twice a week.

Application forms are being printed now and should be available soon in residences, at the AMS office and at INFO bank. Lambert is confident that the Deans' Table will be underway the first week in October.

Mahoney hired by AMS

by Tim Greenwood

Elinor Mahoney, the new AMS Researcher would like to see the position become a high profile one with continued accessibility for students. Mahoney replaces Kathy Grant who headed west this June.

The job of Researcher, a full time paid position is an integral part of the AMS. It is Mahoney's job to provide and compile information for Outer Council members to aid them in policy decisions, to provide continuity between changing administrations, as well as to be a resource for both students and the AMS.

Mahoney graduated from Trent University with degrees in both philosophy and English and during her years there she was continuously involved in student politics. This spring she received her teaching certificate from McArthur where she was on the Faculty Board as a student representative. "Teaching jobs were far and in between so I applied for this position when it came up," Mahoney said.

In between degrees Mahoney gained experience as a researcher working for the Foreign Investment Review Agency when it was just getting off the ground. Being a government job it was "a horrible place to work", she said and she stayed only one year.

This past summer the new AMS researcher completed a comparative study of day-care centres at ten university centres in Ontario. From this information she drew up a set of recommendations which the AMS has taken to the Principal's committee on day-care.

Mahoney also maintains an extensive clippings file of articles cut from the Globe and Whig Standard. She concentrates on the issues of day-care, the woman's issue, ecology and conservation, human rights, education and the upcoming federal election. Any interested students or groups are welcome to drop by her office and consult these clippings.

She has also made herself familiar with the Landlords and Tenant Act, Property Standards and Municipal Bylaws, as well as OSAP and the grant-loan system. She is available for consultation by needy students but emphasized that she is no expert.

Staff Meeting Friday Sept. 15 at 2:30 pm
Everyone welcome!

Remember, anything we can do you can do better.

The lineup blues

by Bill Pentney

As the light slowly fades into deep and murky night this small city dozes quietly off into blissful sleep. BUT WAIT... what's that noise? Oil thigh g'ban g'what? Yes kids, you guessed it, the students have returned. And this is the louiest way to begin an Opinions section that I ever heard of. But I had no choice. It was late on press nite, time was running out, and still no one had an opinion on anything. The reason for 'hat should be obvious to all of you who were here the past week. We were all bored out of our minds, or 'somethinged' out of our minds. But definitely not opinionated.

I did have an opinion on something once, I think it was on Tuesday I was waiting in line in A&P getting some food to keep me from starving to death while I registered. After two years of enduring the mindless herding through the Arena that is commonly known as registration I was determined to be prepared. I had a lunch, a wineskin full of Ruby Rouge, and a warm young freshette under my arm. Incidentally I had to line up for her too, the RMC escort and bell hop service had returned also. Anyway, there I was in this grocery store carrying more food than I could possibly afford, trying to think of a story to kick off the year with. The monotony of the lineup began to dull my "never too sharp at the-best of times" senses and the idea (pitiful though it was) slipped from my mind. This process was repeated several times, leaving my mind unfit for habitation by man or beast. It was in this pitiful condition that I wandered in the Journal office, a broken man, on my last legs.

But no sooner had I crossed the threshold of this bustling news room and I was transformed. New energy surged into me, my mind was once again razor-sharp. Yes ladies and gentlemen, I was saved. And you too can share this uplifting experience (for only $2.95 and a coupon from any of our retail outlets). Seriously though, this entire article has been an overblown plea for help. The Opinions section is now soliciting. We want your letters, opinions, thoughts, dirty laundry. How about a date with your sister? We do reserve the right to edit, distort, or molest any of the material that you send us, but we'll try to contact you before changing anything. Think of it this way, if you send in lots of letters and articles you won't have to read any more of this tripe. Oh yes, by the way, don't let the lineups get you down, they are a Queen's tradition. Next time you are in a lineup just look back at the poor sot behind you and remember, we all have our place. You are a vital link in a chain of boredom stretching the length and breadth of Queen's U. So smile, at Queen's we make you feel like a somebody. (A somebody waiting in a line most likely, but a somebody nevertheless.)

by Paul D. Tinari

In this period of financial constraints, it has often been suggested that the Queen's Orientation, which costs over $30,000 to put on, should be eliminated. The purpose of orientation, in my opinion, is to provide an atmosphere in which the new student will respond favourably, such as by making an effort to get to know some of his classmates, and some of the students in higher years. The Gael group allows the Frosh to benefit from more personalised attentions, provided by the Gaels, which allows them to fit in much less painfully into University life.

No arguments which could be put forward would be as convincing as actually seeing the results of the Queen's Orientation programme. Within a few hours of being assigned to Gael groups, Frosh are doing nearly flawless Oil Thighs, and many already have gael group songs. The new student, almost without being aware of it, has been made aware of the meaning of "University Spirit" for which Queen's is known throughout Ontario.

Is Orientation worth the price? I believe it is because a university can only hope to be as good as the students. Where would Queen's be without the energy, and pride of its students? It would simply be a collection of cold limestone buildings on the shore of Lake Ontario, devoid of anything resembling its present vitality. It is a difficult thing to make a new student feel at home in a strange institution with over 10,000 others who are total strangers. With our present orientation, strangers embrace strangers, and while singing Gael group songs and Oil-Thighs, new friendships are made, and this individual rapidly loses his shyness and begins to identify himself as a Queen's student. In a world where billions are spent on arms and weapons, the money spent on orientation is indeed a small price to pay for the sense of unity instilled in the student body. True, each year the week is marred by incidents of vandalism and so on, but these are in general isolated events which should not be used as a basis on which to judge the whole role of orientation. Queen's remains unchanged as leader in the quality of orientation which it presents to its incoming first year students. It is perhaps the best which could be obtained at any price, thanks primarily to the efforts of students. Congratulations should be given to those students who gave so much of their time to the organizing of this years orientation.

Grub-street (grub-betree) 1630 L. Orig. The name of a street near Moorfields in London (now Milton Street) 'much inhabited by writers of small histories, dictionaries, and temporary poems'; hence, the tribe of literary hacks.

by Colin Brown

There's just something about a street full of people that tends to make one's evening.

Street parties have long been a tradition at Queen's, and the enterprising individuals who make them happen are as much a part of this university as any emeritus professor or portraited former principal will ever be. The fact that some of the characters who tend to be seen at these affairs bare striking physical and manneristic resemblances to John Belushi and the gang from "Animal House" is quite apparent, and somewhat misleading. You see, without the John Belushi's of this world, life would be pretty boring and downright mediocre.

I dare not suggest that Orientation Week at Queen's is in the slightest bit mediocre. However, if one has seen three or four of them it becomes obvious that they are essentially all a blur (for one reason or another) and that the moments which stand out in memory are those involving the lovable characters sporting the yellowest jackets on the block.

There is a rather unfortunate tendency among members of the Commerce and Arts orientation (Gaels and frosh alike) to regard members of the engineering faculty with a certain amount of disdain, if not disgust. Such a reaction is perfectly obvious and perhaps rational for anyone involved in such activities. It is very easy to criticize some poor paint-covered beer-chugging individual from another faculty while your crowd is riding around in limousines sporting their Bay Street best. It is also easy to dismiss them because of their certain eccentricities (i.e. not riding around in limousines) and leave many people, particularly the frosh, with an innate dislike of those rambunctious sorts with the yellow jackets.

It should be remembered, however, that the reason these rambunctious sorts tend to display their emotions more than most is because they are bred here to work harder - and play harder - than all the rest of us. Their approach to Queen's University is full-throttle, and it leaves one to wonder if they don't get a lot more out of four years of university than the rest of us.

However this tolerance is justifiably short-lived, when groups of students somehow cross the line and become gangs of students, banging on car tops, yelling obscenities and destroying property.

One of the most dangerous habits of partying students is blocking the roads. First year students will probably not be aware of an incident that happened a couple of years ago on Division St. Students were on the road and a motorist whose way was blocked chose to back up, then pit his yellow pick-up against the group of students on the street. The result was that a student was struck and severely injured. The image of that truck approaching the crowd comes to mind everytime I see a crowd partying on the street. So, those who are not really motivated by any sense of civic responsibility or whatever, might keep this in mind when their wanderings find them on the pavement.

Before anyone thinks that I am all doom and gloom, I'd like to say welcome back and enjoy the week.

David L. Brown
AMS President

So let's enjoy all the inspired madness of frosh week and its friendly rivalries as well. But if it happens to be your first week at Queen's, don't forget to take in as much of the place as you can. And if you're at some wild party on University Avenue and some guy roars by you in a gutted-out supercharged Volkswagen hot rod, don't be afraid to thank him for a good time.

Parties and pavement???

Signs disgust city man

The Editor:

I have been most alarmed over the last few days at the number of posters, signs and banners around the city near the university, aimed it would seem, exclusively at the youthful female "frosh".

If these people can view the sinful goings on of people who have no moral foundation with amusement, then they need help from a competent doctor.

Specifically, signs like "Kiss virginity goodbye" and "The pussy parlour" bother me a great deal. They create an atmosphere in which sex is glorified and encouraged, and the sinful nature of casual relationships is ignored.

I should think that the university authorities would find the children responsible for these outrageous signs and takes steps to have them removed from university life. There is a dangerous influence.

Yours truly

QEA first concert presentation

Harmonium: Quebec in Concert

by Frank Mulock

Quebec's most successful rock group, Harmonium, open their 1978 North American fall tour with two performances September 22 at Grant Hall.

Harmonium was founded as a trio in 1973 and has since then been instrumental in the development of a distinctive Quebec sound. Their music is almost symphonic in scope, lush string, wind and horn arrangements complement a smooth acoustic sound. This progressive folk-rock is not too far away from some of the music currently being produced by the likes of Supertramp and Genesis.

Harmonium also distinguishes itself via its politics. It is the first avowedly separatist group to reach out for and achieve success beyond the boundaries of la belle province.

Serge Fiori, co-founder and chief songwriter for the band, has in many interviews over the years discussed the group's music, politics, as well as the problems involved in playing French music in a business that finds English performers much more commercially palatable.

On being offered a large sum to record an album in English: "I'm french-speaking, a Quebecer, and that's what the music must reflect. There is a force in the music that transcends words and language. The voice can be just another colour. People may not understand all, but they can feel what I want to say. . . . In Montreal, we have as much an English, as a French, audience. I think it's important for an English audience to try to learn our lyrics the way we learned English while listening to English musicians. . . . Perhaps a translation might be helpful, the way Bruce Cockburn translates his lyrics to French on his album covers. He's already offered to translate lyrics for the next album, he's got the sensitivity to do it."

On separatism: "It's important as it's made everyone outside Quebec aware of what's happening there. That's why every Quebec poet and musician wants separation so when he comes to Ontario he has respect. The rest of Canada wasn't aware so much was happening until recently. All this time, while the rest of Canada has been talking, talking about this and that, Quebec has been doing things. . . . If people have trouble listening for political reasons, that's not our problem, it's theirs."

Harmonium has released three albums: "Harmonium", "Les Cinq Saisons", and "L'hep-tade" (a double release investigating the psychic phenomena associated with the mysterious number seven). Recently, Fiori teamed up with Richard Seguin of Beau Domage to release "Deux Cent Nuits a L'heure". All Harmonium waxings have sold very strongly at approximately 200,000 copies each, the majority of which unfortunately have been bought in Quebec.

As the band has exhausted just about all possible performing outlets in Quebec, they have decided to take the plunge and attempt to crack the American market. On September 29, Harmonium will open "Quebec

Week", a festival being staged on the Berley campus of the University of California. One of the band's higher profile fans will be in attendance. Premier Levesque, scheduled to tour the West Coast at the same time, will be dropping in for their performance.

If the present tour is anything like the last, we may expect quite a show from the septet. The last tour involved two hours of music, (the majority of which was culled from the "L'Heptade" release). An excellent light show complemented an extensive visual display dealing with the mystical number seven. These visuals were put together in collaboration with the National Film Board. While all songs will be performed in French, they will also, for the uninitiated, be introduced and explained in English.

The two concerts take place at 7 and 10:30 Friday, September 22 at Grant Hall. Tickets are reasonably priced at $5 and are available at the regular outlets, the Performing Arts Box Office, Sam's, Silver Threads, Shopper's Records and Tapes, and Finlay's Sports.

Toronto to Host Arts FestivalsStaff

Toronto is the location of two important gatherings over the next few weeks. In town are the Toronto Dance Festival and the Festival of Festivals.

In what promises to be one of the most spectacular events in Canadian dance history is the Toronto Dance Festival Opening at the Toronto Workshop Productions Theatre on Monday September 18th, it will run for five weeks. Among the companies to give performances are such notables as The National Ballet, The Royal Winnipeg Ballet, and Les Grands Ballets Canadiens. In all 19 companies from across Canada will be participating and will provide an opportunity for those interested in dance to see a wide variety of styles.

Two companies are giving performances at the Festival just prior to going on tour. The National Ballet who are planning stops in numerous eastern Canadian communities including Kingston, and Dan-cemakers a small Toronto based company who are to embark on a seven week western tour from

Winnipeg to Vancouver

The Toronto Dance Festival is indicative of the recent rise in popularity of dance in Canada. Congratulations go to festival co-ordinator Roger Jones of the Toronto Dance Theatre for organizing this rare display of Canadian talent.

Currently in Toronto is the Festival of Festivals in which a number of new Canadian as well as other films can be seen. This year the Canadian Film Awards will be included in the program. A total of 74 films will be presented over seven days including the Canadian film "In Praise of Older Women" which has been in the news recently and nominated for ten Film Awards.

Again this year arguments are flying over the issue of what constitutes a Canadian film. Co-productions are always questionable and seek the label, Canadian, in order to qualify for tax breaks. This year it is the film "Power Game."

The following is the text of the manifesto by major Canadian cultural organizations [collectively forming the 1812 committee] criticizing federal spending cuts related to the arts.

For 50 years and more the people of Canada have pursued a policy of active support of the arts, culture and communications.

We have done this because we believe that in these areas we can best share our hopes and deepen our understanding of each other.

We have done this through public institutions such as the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, the National Film Board, the Canada Council, the National Museums of Canada, the Canadian Film Development Corporation and others.

We have done this by our increasing use and appreciation of the products of the Canadian creative community - the books, magazines, plays, radio and television programs, records, operas, paintings, films, music, crafts - the full range of Canadian entertainment and expression.

Yet today this whole effort is in great danger of being sacrificed because the advisors of the present Government do not believe that Canadians care about their art and culture.

For a number of years the arts, always struggling to survive, have been subjected to increasing restraints, which have in most cases substantially reduced the support in real dollars.

Now we are witnessing a further indiscriminate slashing of budgets. The results are predictable:

-Further reductions in services to the public, including increasingly curtailed operations by theatres, orchestras, museums, art galleries and so on.

-Increasing unemployment among artists and other workers throughout this labour-intensive field. Thousands of creative Canadians will be thrown out of work.

-The crippling cut at the CBC - our main bulwark against the smothering tide of foreign programming - has already resulted in the cancellation of its long overdue plans to increase the production of Canadian programs, and the CBC is now planning to cut its existing Canadian programming.

We agree that cuts in Government spending are necessary, where they clearly serve the public interest. But these indiscriminate cuts in the arts and communications will lead to cultural disaster. This is not in the public interest.

Half a century of public investment is being ruthlessly tossed away, apparently without thought of the consequences.

Die, say the advisors to this Government, more concerned with the political life of the party than the well being of a people.

We are not prepared to die.

We are going to fight.

We are going to fight for the future, for the right of any talented Canadian to be able to develop, work, live and serve in this country.

It is not just money that is at issue now: it is our right to exist, and by existing to affirm the right of this country to exist.

Those who have advised this Government that the people do not care, that the arts and culture can be sacrificed, are wrong.

We therefore demand: (1) That the indiscriminate, politically motivated cuts in federal spending on the arts, culture and communications be revoked. (2) That there be no further delay in developing a comprehensive public policy - in full consultation with the creative community - to guide the future of our arts, culture and communications industries. (3) That in implementing this policy, ways be found to insure that the public agencies are both responsive and efficient.

To fight against such arbitrary acts of government, to affirm the solidarity of the community of artists in Canada, we have formed the 1812 Committee, so named because we intend to win.

We call on all Canadians who share our concern to join us.

The 1812 Committee: Association of Canadian Orchestras, Association of Canadian Publishers, Association of Canadian Radio and Television Artists, Association of Culture Executives, Book and Periodical Development Council, Canadian Actors' Equity, Canadian Artists Representation, Canadian Authors Association, Canadian Book Publishers Council, Canadian Booksellers Association, Canadian Broadcasting League, Canadian Child and Youth Drama Association, Canadian Conference of the Arts, Canadian Crafts Council, Canadian League of Composers, Canadian Library Association, Canadian Museums Association, Canadian Music Centre, Canadian Music Council, Council of Canadian Film Makers, Dance in Canada, Directors Guild of Canada, Guild of Canadian Playwrights, League of Canadian Poets, Periodical Writers Association of Canada, Periodical Distributors of Canada, Playwrights Co-op Inc., Professional Art Dealers Association of Canada Inc., Profession Association of Canadian Theatres, Union des Artistes, Writers' Union of Canada.

Gov't cuts in the arts resisted by 1812 committee

by Nick Gray

Monday saw the announcement of a new organization to fight indiscriminate Government cutbacks in the arts, culture, and communications fields in Canada. To be known as the 1812 Committee, (see its manifesto page), it believes that current Government policy in the arts and creative fields is both detrimental and dangerous to the long range development of Canadian Culture. Moreover, the committee feels the public supports and has as much to lose as an individual whose livelihood depends on the progressive development of these fields.

Recognizing that the era of constraints is upon us the committee feels that it is important to point out that the issue cannot always be brought down to pure dollars and cents. It is worth noting that during the last phase of cutbacks in the industry during the 1960s witnessed devastating consequences. Many of our top performers and creative people left the country or dropped out of the arts altogether. That situation is only now being eradicated with a new influx of talent.

The fundamental concern is what do we desire from our creative community? Despite the ever continuing debate over the issue of the nature of Canadian culture and identity there exists a unique talent and personality to Canadians. It is both necessary and desirable that we should continue to support artistic, cultural and communication people. Regression has never been a satisfactory solution. Recognition must be given to this country's cultural community that it is both viable and necessary to the country.

The 1812 Committee is made up of some of the most influential and knowledgeable cultural, artistic and communication organizations and deserves the right to be heard. From all indications there will be no question that it will prove to be viable, communicative and strong in the fight against Government cutbacks.

editor, n., & v.t. 1. Ancient Roman magistrate drawing up register or census of citizens & supervising public morals; person expressing opinions on others morals and conduct 2. Official licensing, or suppressing as immoral, seditious, or inopportune, books plays, news, or military intelligence

The Concise Oxford Dictionary.

The recent reversal of a decision by the Ontario Censor Board is very unusual and has brought the issue of censorship into the limelight yet again. The makers of the Canadian film, 'In Praise of Older Women,' were recently informed by the Ontario Censor Board that it would have to cut over two minutes from the film. After protest from both the film's producer and the Director of the Festival of Festivals they were informed that only 38 seconds would have to be cut.

The censorship of films is nothing new and is relatively unimportant in itself. It will continue despite the protest of many organizations who are not opposed to the classification of films only to the cutting.

Unfortunately there has been a dramatic growth of censorship not only from official bodies but also by citizens groups all across North America. Examples included the self imposed censorship of violence by television executives in the U.S. to movements aimed at banning the availability of certain written works from schools and libraries. The exact motivation for such groups is unclear. It could be an overall move to the right, conservatism and the corporate mould; an endorsement of the old worn out theory of the adage 'out of sight out of mind'.

The dangers are apparent to those who choose to examine the issues. The intellectual community and those concerned with the rights of the individual must take a firm stand to eradicate this movement. Our whole society is based on the premise of individual rights and freedom of expression in the written or spoken word. To change the premise undermines the foundation of Western Democracy.

Surely we can be responsible for our own censorship. The freedom of choice to read, see, or otherwise experience something is enough. Why is there this insistence on making others do it for us?

Be 'Engaged'

Once again this fall the Queen's Drama Department will provide wayward Frosh and restless upper classmen with yet another delightful diversion.

This year's Staff and Grad Show brings W.S. Gilbert's Engaged back onto the stage after a long absence from the theatrical repertoire.

Under the direction of Charles Hayter, Gilbert's unerring comic sense and hilarious satire will be brought to life in a play that features Jack Boschman as Cheviot Hill, the incredibly stingy young gentleman whose incessant craving for women brings upon him all the enraged wrath of his friends, relatives and acquaintances. The resulting comic situations are often hilarious.

Engaged runs for four evenings opening Wednesday, September 13 through to Saturday, September 16, (in the Theological Hall). Tickets are available at the Department of Drama at $3.00 general and $1.50 for students and senior citizens.

Gaels expect tough season

Football Gaels; another strong team

by Tim Turnbull

"It's going to be a very close race. As I see it right now, just about everybody has a chance to win this division," said Coach Doug Hargreaves of the football Gaels in an interview earlier this week.

"With the possible exception of University of Quebec at Trois Rivieres the Eastern Division could produce some surprising upsets."

The Gaels open this season on Saturday at home against Trois Rivieres Les Patriotes.

Hargreaves feels Queen's will face a stiff challenge this year defending their OQIFC-Eastern division football championship. Last year Queen's, Bishop's and McGill tied for first with 5-2 records, but Queen's trounced Bishop's 45-27 in the playoffs at George Richardson Stadium. The same tight race is likely to occur again, so the Gaels must play tough, disciplined football if they want to reach the Atlantic Bowl and avenge their loss to the Acadia Axemen.

The 1978 edition of the Gaels will once again be an imposing force on offence, led by quarterback Jim Rutka. As a passer, scrambler and leader, Rutka is rated very highly by Hargreaves. Dave Marinucci should also continue his strong rushing from the fullback spot behind a strong offensive line. Peter Sops, Randy Edgeworth, Pat Plishka, John Wilson and Julian Hanlon can open holes for Marinucci to exploit.

The Gaels can also rely on an explosive air attack to surprise opposition defences. By using sprint outs and play action passes, Rutka should be able to get outside where he can threaten to run or pass to receivers Blain Shore and Bob O'Doherty who have the speed and hands to provide scoring potential from anywhere on the field. For shorter passes, Rutka, can rely on the corps of Paul Shugart, Paul Hazlitt, Dave Best or even Marinucci. Blaine Shore, now able to use a kicking tee on field goals, should demonstrate his consistent accuracy once more.

Defensively, the Gaels will not be as strong this year. With the graduation of Larry Small, Al Jette and Terry Wright, the defensive backfield is considerably weaker.

However, all Canadian Dick Bakker will be back to anchor the line along with Jim Muller, and Paul Langevin, Ed Andrew and injured all star John Vernon (pulled hamstring) are a sound linebacking unit. In the backfield, Ted Tyczka, co-captain Jim D'Andrea and Bruce Balsam are returning.

Queen's can expect stiff competition from McGill, Carleton, and Bishops. Trois Rivieres is not really a threat as they were demolished 43-0 by McGill last week.

"If we can decide that we will be No. 1, and we want it badly enough, these ballplayers can do it."

Rugby Gaels away for opener

by Don Cameron

The Queen's Rugby Club, perennially one of the best college teams in Canada, figures to be even better this year than last.

The team ended their 1977-78 season with a successful U.S. tour of Harvard, M.I.T. and Brown, losing only to Brown in a closely contested match. Led by vice-captains Bill Payne and Steve Wilson, the Rugby Gaels have eleven of fifteen first team players returning and are looking to take the championship this year.

Under the auspices of Coach Gavin Reid, the first week of training has been a success, culminating in an intra-squad scrimmage on Sunday. Gavin's job has been difficult at 170 players are vying for only 30 positions. It has been rumoured the football coaches are pressuring Coach Reid to cut the numbers down so the Football Gaels can pick up some new personnel.

Some of the veterans returning this year are Calypso "Cup" Costello, Nix, Mad-dog, Wee-Williams, Lucky Loucks, Slats, and Tim "Prep" Price.

The season opener is against McMaster on Saturday at McMaster. Starting times for home games will be 12 p.m. for the second team and 2 p.m. for the first's

Lost in the shuffle

Ontario post-secondary institutions have taken it in the teeth again. On August 18th Premier Davis decided to shuffle his cabinet in order to alleviate the pressure on his administration. It seems that at least two of his ministers, namely George McCague and Reuben Baetz, had been placed under constant fire from the opposition parties and concerned interest groups because of unfavourable government policy and decisions implemented by these men.

This pressure put his ministers on the defensive, a position Davis correctly interpreted as a sign of the weakness of his cabinet.

Yet, rather than removing McCague and Baetz from the Cabinet, he simply changed their portfolios; just one example of how scarce talent has become in the Tory ranks.

But the move that most strongly epitomizes this scarcity in talent is the removal of Harry Parrott from the Ministry of Colleges and Universities and the subsequent combination of that portfolio with the Ministry of Education under Bette Stephenson.

Combining the two ministries, particularly at a time when post-secondary institutions are being confronted with severe financial constraints and funding cutbacks by the Ontario government serves only to re-emphasize to students that the financial plight of colleges and universities in Ontario is not a major concern of the Government.

With the prospect of an even further decline in university enrolment and continued provincial funding below the rate of inflation, students are not going to respond favourably to having to wait in line for the attention of Dr. Stephenson. And when one considers that Stephenson is well known for her unwavering support of Cabinet policy, any talk of a softening of the line adopted by Parrott in the past year is an empty dream.

Both these ministries, Colleges and Universities and Education, are complex and demanding. Both deserve the undivided attention of an individual minister. Yet the government is not prepared to offer the students of this province the representation they deserve. Students went through the crucible last spring on the issue of student aid, and re-emerged still on their feet. But, faced with a government bent on relegating the role of the university to second class status, will students have the political clout to gain busy Bette's attention? Hopefully, but by no means assuredly.

Frosh week: striking a balance

Orientation week is back again, and the time has come to wrestle with certain questions it poses.

For many years the week was used purportedly, to cement school spirit. This was done by so degrading first year students that they were forced to draw together if only in the interests of self-preservation.

In the recent past, this approach has been tempered by a concern for actually orienting the student to Queen's, both academically and socially.

This year the trend away from hazing, and towards orientation in the strict sense of the word continues, but while retaining a certain appreciation for the traditional Queen's spirit. Yet the lingering division persists. Is the goal to instill a sense of individualism in first year students, or esprit de corps? Is it to develop the person or cement group loyalty?

The Arts and Science Orientation Committee considers the development of the individual to be the primary goal of Frosh Week. Engineering and Commerce claim it is to create year solidarity. What both seem almost unwilling to admit is that elements of each approach have permeated all faculties.

Engineers, always considered the most rowdy element on campus during frosh week, are now cleaning up their act, apparently as a result of the growing number of women in their ranks.

On the other hand, there is quite clearly no lack of spirit around Queen's this fall. All faculty orientation committees report highly enthusiastic recruits for this year. There have been no complaints of over zealous upper year students mistreating freshmen.

It appears that a healthy balance has been struck. That's the way it should be, the individual and the spirited frosh together in one person.

Police raid parties, charge 10 students

by Tom Mohr

Ten students are awaiting trial on charges resulting from a police raid on two student parties last Thursday evening. Four police cars and a paddy wagon carrying approximately ten policemen, arrived at 166 University Ave and 262 Earl St. at approximately 10:00pm.

Ian Rosszell, a fourth-year Commerce student, was attending the party at 262 Earl at the time. He claims there were only twenty people in attendance when the first police car arrived.

"A police car pulled into the lot and parked behind the paddy wagon. One officer emerged from the car with his billy club drawn," he said.

Chief of Police Rice denied the billy clubs were drawn. "That's an absolute out-and-out lie," Rice said.

Approximately $1500 in beer was confiscated by the police from both locations.

According to Rosszell, Tom Miller and other witnesses, after the police arrived the party of twenty swelled to approximately one hundred, mostly spectators. In an interview, Rice indicated that both parties exceeded one hundred persons at the time the police arrived

The raid had been planned earlier in the day by Rice, Chief of Police. Mayor Ken Keyes indicated that complaints arising out of the Wednesday night dance in the MacCorry parking lot may have instigated the police crackdown.

"I believe it prompted police to review the matter and decide that they had better take a firmer stand on the activities of Orientation Week," Keyes said.

Evidence for the charges was gathered in part by undercover policemen. One of those deployed to the Earl St. party posed as a Science 79 student. When the police entered the party in force, the undercover policeman directed his associates to the party organizers, who were arrested.

Charged with violations under the Liquor License Act are Susan Mackenzie, Leslie Anderson, Cathy Mundy, Patsy Porteous, Geoff Maier, Steve Whight, Chris Cuthbert, and two others whose names were not available at press time. Geoff Arnoldi is charged with creating a public disturbance. The hearing is set for October 12.

Noise angers citizens

by John Bakke and Tim Greenwood

The problems surrounding last Wednesday's open-air dance at MacCorry were the first in a series of incidents which scarred Orientation Week 1978. According to Mayor Ken Keyes, what resulted was "the greatest problem we have ever had in Kingston between Orientation and the city."

Excessive noise emanating from the dance was the major complaint. According to police, they received over 50 complaints during the first hour of the dance originating from as far away as West Campus and beyond. The A.M.S., which acts as a medium between the public, the police, and student activities, also received numerous noise complaints. According to Paul Sobanski, head of the A.M.S. Orientation Committee, the calls received through the A.M.S. complaint center were "almost all noise complaints. There were few complaints involving vandalism, unlike earlier in the week."

Trish Osler, Social and Cultural Convener for Orientation 1978 and organizer of the outdoor dance said she anticipated a few complaints about noise but she was totally unprepared for the deluge of calls that swamped the A.M.S. and police.

by Kim Fennell

Queen's OSAP applications are down 25.7% this year over last, according to Bob Merrifield, Student Awards Officer. Merrifield claimed that the decline was due to tougher scrutiny in this year's program. The Ministry now has easier access to a student's financial status.

Hugh Christie, last year's AMS President, stated, "If the applications are down because the money is being restricted to those who really need it, then that's good." Christie pointed out however, that if the fewer applications were a reflection of reduced accessibility to university because of OSAP changes, then it's an entirely different story. Michelle Meyer, of Queen's Students Against Cutbacks and Unemployment, said, "The Ministry is quite happy that fewer people have applied. That was their intention when revamping the program." She offered several reasons for the reduction in applications. Students are only eligible for full grant assistance if their parent's net income was below $6,600 in 1977. The figure under last year's OSAP was $7600. Meyer thought this may deter some lower income students from returning to school because they don't want to take out loans. Students are required to begin repaying loans six months after graduation and many are concerned that they won't find jobs quickly, Meyer said.

$6,000 lost in error

by Warren Everson

The AMS will have to absorb the loss of over six thousand dollars which was mistakenly paid to constables last year, Vice President (Operations) John Koopman has announced.

Koopman told Outer Council in June he had discovered the error in March. Chief Constable Granville Gibbons had been unable to explain the over payment, and had been fired from the constable system.

"We went through the books for two days trying to figure it out," Koopman told the Journal Friday. "It was just a mess. You simply couldn't follow it. So finally I told Granville that since he couldn't furnish an explanation, I could no longer justify his employment as a constable."

The constable payroll is included in a single account with all the other AMS-sponsored organizations. Koopman explained. When an event is held requiring policing, the payroll for those constables should equal the bill sent to the organizers of the event.

"Our books indicate that everyone has been correctly billed, but between six and seven thousand dollars more was paid in salaries that was brought in from the bills," he said. "Granville made a mess of everything"

Koopman blames the system of billing and payrolls for the error, which happened before the present executive was elected. As a preventive measure, the new chief constable, Colin Carter, has been instructed to submit the bills and payroll at the same time for checking.

"We can't have a separate account for every organization for which we control monies without a much bigger staff of people to keep the books organized. It's probably cheaper to allow these relatively small errors to go rather than paying salaries for a huge staff of auditors."

Summer vandalism

by Mike Dillon

At least one group of students renting an off-campus house was in for a rude awakening this fall when they returned to university as their house had been badly vandalized over the summer.

Liz Ferguson of 304 University Ave. says that after sub-letting this spring she and three other Queen's students returned to find their house "filthy and badly damaged." Furthermore, some of their personal effects had been abused. "We estimate that five to six hundred dollars' damage had been done to our house," she said. In addition, the summer's rent of two hundred dollars was never paid.

Reports from neighbours indicate at times fifteen youths occupied the residence; the police were summoned a number of times when the music and noise grew too loud, but they were unable to find enough evidence to lay charges.

Some neighbours were so annoyed by garbage thrown onto their property that a "vigilante" action was planned. "Some of our neighbours were thinking of getting together to force them out, but nothing came of it," Mrs. G.R. Clark, a next door neighbour said.

Although they were extremely upset with the damage done to the house, the students lay some of the blame on themselves for not carefully scrutinizing their tenant. "No one in their right mind should rent to Kingston punks," Ferguson said.

To assist in reaching the lessee, who had apparently left Kingston for Toronto, Legal Aid was contacted. However Dave Brown, one of the students living in the house, says, "I don't entertain much hope of getting anything."

Noise arouses complaints

police moved in on the dance after consulting the A.M.S. and had the music turned down. Police sources say that after they left the immediate area, the music was turned up again, which according to Keyes, "precipitated phenomenal calls."

Osler said, however, that with each new surge of complaints the volume was lowered a little, and that she "never noticed any volume increase after the initial decrease."

At 9 o'clock a group of Queen's authorities including Vice-Principal Love, Dr. Bennett, and Mr. Watts who had been alerted by irate citizens arrived on the scene to confer with the organizers.

The large number of complaint calls both to the police and the A.M.S. prompted Principal Watts to make a public apology the following day. Mayor Keyes noted that even after Watt's apology, the police still encountered irate complaint calls.

The mass of complaints from the public about the noise triggered the police to take a "firmer stand" in the activities of the Orientation Week," said Keyes. He also added that the event "may have precipitated a 'get tougher' attitude on the part of the police."

Fire door in at last

by John Baktis

The long awaited fire door has emerged from a mass of indecision and red tape to make its appearance in the MacLaughlin Room Pub. It was finally installed last week according to "quiet pub" manager Doug Wilkie.

The door, due to have been finished last September, met with last minute indecision on the part of Kingston Fire Inspector Captain Hogan.

Before the door was to have been completed, its construction had gained the approval of both the liquor and fire inspectors. The day before the door's completion, captain Hogan reversed his decision and called for an alteration in the door's construction. His proposal of a vestibule into which the door would have resulted in reduction of the pub's seating capacity. Hence, construction was halted.

Later that same day, Hogan changed his mind again and the original design was formally approved once more.

Kingston building laws require the pub to have separate fire exits at two corners of the room. The final agreement reached between Pub management and Captain Hogan will meet these stipulations. With this accomplished, the seating capacity of the "quiet pub" will be raised from the existing 59 persons to 80 people.

The addition of several tables and chairs, along with some bar stools, will meet the rise in seating capacity. Lunches and music are other additions to the pub.

Work goes on

by Warren Everson

The steps at the front of the John Deutsch University Centre will be finished by the end of term, says Norm Hart, Manager of the building.

The work, which began in June was halted by a province-wide carpenter's strike after the excavation had begun. Without the carpenters the forms for the cement could not be laid. The carpenters working for the university were so overworked that they did not have time to do the job, said Hart.

Work was resumed last week, with workers first pumping water out of the excavation. Inclement weather has prevented steady progress since that time, though some is being made.

The steps will eventually look much as they did before the work started, but will have two flights of stairs leading down under the main door to an entrance to the basement.

Police chief comments

by Colin Brown

Some of the assertions Kingston Chief of Police Gerald Rice made to the Journal with regard to Thursday night's raids on off-campus student parties have been contradicted by witnesses.

Chief Rice spoke with the Journal in his office Friday morning in connection with the raids by police at 166 University Avenue and 262 Earl St. When asked why the police waited until Thursday evening of Orientation Week to plan a raid, he replied, "We had no evidence that there was an illegal operation going. There was information or evidence that they were selling beer."

Police officers were present at a party held at 182 University Ave. on Monday, September 11th. They asked the people running the party to close the bar, and the organizers complied without further incident.

Chief Rice also told the Journal, "The only people brought in were people who were charged, to the best of my knowledge". Drew Fagan, a fourth year commerce student, was kept in a cell for three hours and then released with no charges against him.

In a third contested issue, the chief rejected the assertion that members of his force had entered the Earl St. party with billy-clubs drawn. "That is an out and out lie," Rice stated. Two witnesses to the police's arrival, Ian Rosszell and Tom Miller, stand by their claim that one uniformed officer approached the residence with his billy-club drawn.

Place d'Armes project hassles

by Nick Gray

Two redevelopment projects are currently slated for the same general area in Kingston under the auspices of two different groups. One is the Minto Corporations proposal for the Place d'Armes, the other OHIP's proposed new office building. Between these two groups is the City of Kingston which has been asked to take on the onus of pressuring the two groups together, a role it is not anxious to assume according to Ad Hoc Committee member E.V. Swain.

The Minto proposal for the Place d'Armes site includes the construction of offices, retail stores, a hotel, residential units and a marina facility. OHIP is planning to construct a new office building for the move to Kingston of their OHIP records and workers in the government's decentralization plan. They have already drawn up preliminary plans. The Minto Corporation is seeking to get OHIP to move into its site, a move that OHIP would take if endorsed by the city. Swain commented that it is hoped that the two groups can resolve their differences by mutual co-operation and discussion.

Redevelopment in the downtown area has been hampered due to problems over land ownership, financial constraints and the relocation of existing facilities.

Professor's Prize to be offered

by Warren Everson

The Department of Physics is sponsoring the second annual "Professor's Prize for an essay on Natural Philosophy". The three hundred dollar award will be announced February 9 for the winner on the topic, "The Evolution of Our Perception of Time".

The rules of the contest call for an essay of approximately 5,000 words to be turned in on or before January 19, 1979. Essayists will be asked to "assign the submitted essays and their copyrights to the University."

The contest is open to any undergraduate of the University. Candidates are advised, but not required, to provide a list of themes that he or she has developed, including such ideas as "time keeping technology, the nature of time itself, the nature of relativistic time, and general correlations between the nature of our societies and the perception of time."

The prize is sponsored by the professors themselves, to "promote an appreciation of the foundations and rich concepts of fundamental natural science."

Soon after the award is presented, the department will arrange an evening gathering in which the winning essay will be examined, either by the winner's address or a panel discussion with professors and students.

Accused spent hour in jail

Students face court in raid's aftermath

by Colin Brown

Last Thursday was like a nightmare to four girls who wanted to throw a frosh week party.

The residents of 262 Earl St. had planned an outdoor party with the male residents of 258 Earl St. It was to be held in the parking lot behind their houses and beer would be sold at a cash bar. They never dreamt their idea would wind them up in jail.

There were approximately twenty people milling around in the parking lot at ten o'clock when four police cars and a paddy wagon arrived. Plain-clothes and uniformed officers walked through the front door of 262 Earl Brandishing badges, flashlights, a camera and a search warrant and informed the four girls that they were under arrest. Several undercover agents, one who wore Science '79 jacket and had purchased the first five beer tickets sold at the party, immediately identified the members of the house to the arresting officers. As they were led out to the waiting police cars on Earl St., one girl was so convinced by the Science '79 policemen that she thought he was an engineer instigating her escape.

The girls, several of which were in tears, waited in the cars in front of their residence for fifteen minutes. At one point, those inside a car went to open a door for one of their roommates who was joining them and found there were no door handles present in the back of the car. While they sat there, police were inside, photographing cases of beer and arranging to load them onto the paddy wagon.

Meanwhile, in the back lot a crowd of almost 100 had gathered with the presence of the two squad cars and the paddy wagon. Many jeered and gestured at the police when they drove the girls around to the back. There was another five minute wait, sitting in the cars in the midst of the crowd. "It was a humiliating thing - a nightmare," recalled one of the girls. Several felt that the arresting officers felt "bad" about what they were doing. Another asked the policeman at the wheel of her car what they were being charged with. "Nothing serious", came the reply.

The girls and three male neighbours from 258 Earl, (one of which had been charged with disorderly conduct when he emphatically questioned the police's activities) were then driven to Kingston Police Headquarters. Most went immediately to jail cells where they were to remain locked for up to two hours before being formally charged. One male student stayed in a cell until after one a.m. until he was released, as the result of one of his roommates reminding police he was still there. He was not charged and taken home.

Two girls were not kept in cells. To one, it seemed the policemen present with them were "not taking their presence very seriously" and recalls hearing the sound of laughter from other officers observing them.

Back in the cellblock one girl shared a cigarette with another by slipping it around the wall of her cell and through the bars of her friend's. She still had not been told with what she was being charged.

The last of the students were returned home by police by 1:30 Friday morning.

Charity day a big success

Staff

First year students at Queen's University raised a record $14,597 for local charities this week when their sales talents were put to the test in a volunteer fund-raising drive.

Local businesses provided the facilities for Artsci frosh who spent the day car-washing. They raised $708 to be split between Amnesty International and Camp Outlook.

Shoe-shining and hospital visits also proved to be successful, and the Canadian Cystic Fibrosis Foundation will receive $5,389 as a result - a 40 per cent increase from earlier years.

The Engineering Society's peanut sales took on sizeable increases this year as they almost doubled the amount to be donated to Rotarian sponsored programs.

Prof's faith in school
unshaken after tragedy

by Tom Mohr

This summer, a canoeing tragedy on the cold waters of Lake Tamiskaming, Quebec took the lives of 13 people, including Queen's student Mark Denny. The ill-fated expedition was led by Richard Bird, a Queen's Commerce Professor with close ties to St. John's School for Boys in Claremont, Ontario. Bird's part in the rescue and regrouping procedures was nothing short of heroic, according to Pat Flanagan, a Commerce student and graduate of St. John's.

"The situation deteriorated to the point where all the canoes had tipped. The wind and waves were pretty bad. One boy began to yell, and Richard decided to try to take him into shore. In the process of bringing Cunningham (the name of the boy) in, the wind and waves blew them about 80 yards down from where the canoes were. When they got in to shore, Richard lay Cunningham on a rock ledge and threw himself on top to warm up the boy. He then told him to stay where he was, and went off along the shore to get to a point where he could swim out again", Flanagan said.

After having made it to shore with Cunningham, Bird entered the water three more times, every time bringing back a youngster. Of the four Bird brought to shore, only Cunningham lived. Bird scoured the shoreline for survivors, then set up a camp and awaited rescue.

"I don't think anybody could have done a better job, considering the circumstances", Flanagan said.

"He did his utmost to make the best of a terrible chain of events. Throughout it all, he kept his head, knowing that he was helpless to save twelve boys he had been with at St. John's, as well as Mark (Denny), who had been a close friend."

Three months have now passed since the tragedy and Bird feels the worst is behind him.

"The hardest time for me was right after the accident. We did not know how parents, the school and public would react. I came back expecting to console parents; I found they sought me out and tried to console me," he said.

A great deal of strength was exhibited by those closely involved with St. John's, Bird said, and he feels it's directly related to the school itself.

St. John's instills strength in people," he said.

"I attended the original Selkirk school in Manitoba during its first years. I found it pretty tough; certainly the most difficult thing I had encountered up to that point in my life.

"I wasn't immediately aware of it, but soon after leaving I realized that St. John's had meant a great deal to my life.

Input into Senate reform

by Jo-Anne Stead

Professor Richard Simeon and Professor William Lederman, both of Queen's University, spoke to the Commons on September 13 on the reform of the Senate. Professor Lederman's testimony may have been an important factor in the federal government's decision to refer part of its constitution reform package to the Supreme Court for a legal opinion according to informed sources.

Professor Simeon, Director of the Institute of Intergovernmental Relations at Queen's was requested to appear before the Senate - Commons committee on the constitution, with his evaluation of Bill 360.

He spoke for 40 minutes on the need for Federal and Provincial cooperation in affecting constitutional reforms.

Lederman spoke on the legal matters concerning the federal government's proposal to reform the Senate by itself. Local M.P. Flora McDonald thought that Professor's Lederman's presentation was a factor in the committee's decision to refer the matter to the Supreme Court.

"I found I was beginning to achieve some academic success and finding my place in the system. I realized that I probably couldn't have done it without the experience of St. John's."

"Since that time I have seen so much indication of the value of that approach to educating young boys. It is reflected, for instance, in the composure of the boys that came back from the catastrophe", Bird said.

St. John's School for Boys is an Anglican school with an arduous outdoor program

"The outdoor activities are a very important element of St. John's. The outdoors is where we are able to fulfill our principles and philosophy. We have been in the outdoors for twenty-five years without any canoeing fatalities. This summer's trip was really no different from any other one up until the time of the accident. The trip was an accident in the pure sense of the word - a series of mishaps that resulted in a catastrophe. But nothing short of going on the trip would have eliminated the risk of such a catastrophe occurring", Bird said.

OSAP grant applications down

by Kim Fennell

The number of students applying for financial assistance under the new Ontario Student Awards Program (OSAP), is significantly lower than in previous years. Bob Merrifield, Student Awards Officer at Queen's, said that as of Friday September 9, the number of applications received was 25.7% lower than last year. He did point out that the Awards Office has received an unusually large number of late applications since that date and suggested this figure may drop.

Merrifield cited "closer scrutiny" in the new program as being the major reason for the decline. Students must now fill out an "Approval for Release of Tax Information" form when applying for OSAP. This gives the Ministry the right to investigate the student's most recent return as well as those of his parents.

The "Statement of Assets" is another addition to the 1978-79 program. Students and their parents must now list all forms of assets and their value as of January 1, 1978. This questionnaire, however, does not have to be filled out by students applying for loans under the Canada Student Loans Program.

This additional information now required of applicants will make it easier for Ministry officials to determine a student's financial standing. This may deter some students who have made sufficient money in the summer from applying to OSAP. Mr. Merrifield stated applications were down across the province and the Queen's figure was approximately the provincial average.

The 1978-79 OSAP substantially differs from last year's program. When asked how he felt about the new program in general, Mr. Merrifield replied that he saw the changes to be good on the whole. He said that more students from lower and middle class incomes will benefit from OSAP. Mr. Merrifield did point out that while OSAP had been changed for the better, this was not without serious costs. Those who will suffer from the changes in OSAP are the graduate students. The new program limits grant assistance to eight eligibility periods, each period being a semester. Thus, students seeking assistance for a longer period of time are only eligible for loans.

The latest financial survey available, the Graduate Studies Income Survey of 1975-76, showed that 6% of the graduate school was receiving grants. Mr. Merrifield estimated that once Law and other post-grad schools were considered, the figure would be around 12%. While he did not have the figures available at the present, Mr. Merrifield stated that the number of grads receiving grants would be obviously lower this year.

Graduates are still eligible for loans but Mr. Merrifield reported that many were turning down their loan offers this year.

While many students will no longer be eligible for grants because of the time limits on grant eligibility, some may be helped by the new "Grandfather Clause" or "Loan Remission Plan." It will be effective from September 1978 to April 1980. If a student takes out a Canada or Ontario Student Loan, and qualifies for Loan Remission, the Ministry will pay a portion of the principal of the loan directly to the student's lending bank. In other words, when the student graduates and begins paying back the loan, the amount he has to repay will be less.

The Ministry has set aside $15 million to be shared among those students who qualify for Loan Remission. The amount remitted will be a percentage of the student's loan over and above the first $1,000 of interest-free principal issued to the student in 1978 and 1979.

Repression not liberation is Rhodesia's grim future

by Paul D. Tinari

As we watch guerrilla attacks devastating both black and white settlements throughout Rhodesia, one may well wonder if any peaceful settlement will ever be possible. Mr. Mugabe, one of the terrorist leaders who are responsible for thousands of murders in the last few years, has repeatedly said that his ultimate aim is to establish a single party communist system in Rhodesia as soon as the Smith government has been overthrown.

What this means in physical terms is the existing political system in Rhodesia will possibly be replaced with a much more repressive one that would violate more of President Carter's 'human rights' than the Smith regime ever did. The United States, in fact, finds itself in a very difficult situation because on one hand it desperately needs the raw materials which are exported by both Rhodesia and South Africa, and on the other, the Carter administration cannot afford to anger the ever growing black vote.

What is happening right now is that by putting into effect a partial embargo against Rhodesia, the United States is sending aid to countries where terrorists are being trained for missions against the Smith Regime, such as Mozambique and Zambia. The United Council of Churches recently gave a very large cash grant to these two countries for "agriculture and education", but most of the money is certain to be spent on weapons and military equipment. An idea of the type of people these 'liberators of Rhodesia' are can be obtained from reading the report issued in connection to the fate of the survivors of a commercial airline crash which occurred near the Zambian border. Most of the men were shot on the spot, while the women and children were herded together and cut to pieces with bayonets.

Some facts of interest should be examined. Thousands of blacks still stream into South Africa, not out of it, trying to escape the repressive regimes of their homelands to the north. Unlike East Germany which has to build walls to keep its people in, the South African government has the reverse problem, of building them to keep multitudes of refugees out. When all the facts are examined one is forced to conclude that, though by our standards repressive, Rhodesia and South Africa have systems which provide a much larger measure of personal freedom than many of the other countries in Africa, or for that matter, throughout the world. Out of the 51 members of the Organisation for African Unity (OAU) at last count, 19 were countries with military dictatorships, 21 have single party systems which we would find totally intolerable, and the remaining tiny minority consist of so-called 'many-party' systems. The conclusion which can be reached is that the South African and Rhodesian systems may not be good, but they are in fact far better than the alternatives.

Meanwhile, global economic sanctions against Rhodesia continue and the countries economy is without doubt deteriorating. It would seem that the Patriotic Front terrorists are determined to set up a Russian/Cuban supported dictatorship, rather than to form a new free country where both blacks and whites could live together in some sort of harmony. One only has to look as far as the vital chrome deposits present in Rhodesia to understand why the communists are investing so much time, men, and effort in that area of Africa. They know that with the control of certain key raw materials such as oil and chrome, the western world will be totally in their grip.

Unfortunately, we can only sit by and watch the events unfold in this key area of the world, but the effects will be felt for a very long time to come.

Police raid in the wrong

Dear Editor,

We are writing to you no more than 15 minutes after leaving a scene at 258 Earl St., that (in our opinion) never should have happened.

DISCRETION. Where was it? In past years the police have helped us control the parties by being friendly and cooperative. But this time they changed the rules and didn't bother to tell the participants.

The very least they could have done was warn the student population that they had decided to change the standards that had been in existence for many years.

Three vehicles and at least ten men (including an undercover man wearing a Science '79 jacket) to "control" 15 students sitting and standing peacefully in a large parking lot. Unnecessary is the way we see it.

Moreover, we feel strongly that this police action caused much more harm than this particular party ever would have.

Yours truly,
Christopher Morton
Kathleen Osterland

Grub-street (grub-bistrit) 1630 1. Orig The name of a street near Moorfields in London (now Milton Street) 'much inhabited by writers of small histories, dictionaries, and temporary poems,' hence, the tribe of literary hacks.

developing between students and police. Until now, that is.

What went wrong, Chief? So we had a party in the Mac-Corry parking lot Wednesday night which produced, to quote the mayor, "The greatest problem we've ever had between Queen's and the city." Well, let's just examine that party which so strongly demonstrated the need for your Thursday night raids.

Granted, it was probably the loudest event ever to be heard in Kingston since Sir John A. arrived too late for last call at the Top Room. But there was very little beer present, in fact AMS constables were in evidence everywhere asking people present to hold onto their bottles and guarding against a disturbance. The crowd was not unruly. The music stopped at ten minutes before midnight, and everybody left.

But the blame must rest with us, and we accept it. The planners of Orientation Week at Queen's would try the best of patience, but somehow we have always survived these without any ugly animosity corner of a natural amphitheatre setting aiming towards the city. It won't happen again. But it was noise Chief, only noise. And it ended before midnight.

Does this justify swooping down on the next evening's festivities and throwing a bunch of students in jail? Was their "clear breach of the law" such a heinous crime considering they had been attending outdoor parties for almost a week where beer was being sold, many of which had your men present? The worst these "criminals" expected to hear from the Kingston Police was to shut the bar down, which they had been telling people to do all week. The bars were shut down, and no party ever grew to "riot" proportions. That is a system which works, and the students and police who have traditionally abided by it have every reason to respect each other.

But here you are at ten o'clock Thursday night throwing these people in jail! Why, chief? Perhaps the heat from the residents over all that noise in a parking lot the night before got to you! But whatever got to you, the result was a bad one. Having your friends carted off to jail one night and losing hundreds of dollars is not something we are about to forget, especially when the tradition of relationships in this community gave no indication or warning that such an event could occur.

It was a cheap thing to do, Chief. And by flexing your muscles in such a way, you have lost a lot of respect in our eyes, as well as a certain element of trust.

It's your town, Chief, and the law is on your side. You can run around tossing people in jail for things like this all the time if you wish. But please don't, because we want to get along with you as much as you do with us. No more surprises, please. They just do not do you credit, and that has nothing to do with breaching the law.

Arts grad takes crack at Journal editor

Dear Editor(s),

The co-editors' job turned editor's job is just the kind of thing I've come to expect from this lib-left rag masquerading as a responsible newspaper journal. An editorship (?) being shared by an ex-communicado (Howe) and a bourgeois wimp private school boy (Hall). Will some crucial questions ever be answered by the ever-knowing, incorrigible, uncorruptable Hall and company? Will Tom Mohr need a blood transfusion for his bleeding heart? Will Bernie Helling ever play a sport? Will Michelle Meyer ever lend vocal support to those oppressed under socialist tyrannies in Albania and the Soviet Union? Will Tim Turnbull ever be able to forget Joe College and find true happiness?

Top Management should be able to find the answers to these mind boggling questions. However, having engaged in the consumption of copious amounts of tequila with the lone remaining editor long ago, I witnessed his complete mismanagement of the demon liquor. It was the Thursday night prior to Homecoming weekend 1978. By the time he had figured out how to manage it all, the weekend was over. Sunday mornings come quickly to those who have been unconcious for two days. (Sorry Hallsie)

I can only hope that the bourgeois wimp private school boy manages the esteemed, much maligned Queen's Journal a little better than he does tequila. Even now, the frosh are probably chanting in the streets and in the residences, specifically the Turkey Palace (Vic): "Never fear, Hall is here!" Good luck buddy.....

Capitalisticly yours,

Cutbacks: Questions...

Last week, during orientation, the A.M.S. Committee of Queen's Students Against Cutbacks and Unemployment (QSACU) took the opportunity to introduce incoming Queen's students to the cutbacks issue. One member of the committee, Ray Schmidt, managed to talk to a number of students, in groups, and individually. Below, is a summary of the most common questions asked about cutbacks and his responses. The Committee would like to thank the students who took part for their interest and cooperation. Anyone interested in learning more about cutbacks should contact the AMS office in the University Centre.

Q: A lot of people are talking about 'cutbacks'. Is that really an appropriate term? After all, there have been no absolute decreases in government expenditure, have there?

A: The rate of inflation is now over 9 percent. The provincial government has set a 5.5% ceiling on social service expenditures, and a 4.8 percent increase limit on health care. There will be a $49 million shortfall in funds just to maintain post-secondary education at 1977-78 levels. This means absolute reductions in services available. It means cutbacks.

Q: But isn't the government just trimming off the fat?

A: For high income groups, access to government services is a luxury. But the government is not attempting to balance its budget by more fully adhering to the well accepted "Ability to pay" principle. Particularly in a period of recession, it is the least privileged who rely on government services most. They are the most affected by cutbacks, and this has the effect of making society more unequal.

Q: Shouldn't we all be more realistic and learn to tighten our belts?

A: For many Canadians, it is hardly a matter of "belt tightening". For them the situation is desperate. The official unemployment rate has hovered around the one million mark for some time. There are now 25 unemployed people for each job vacancy listed in Canada. With little prospect of a job, unemployment insurance and social assistance are the last resort for many Canadians. But the federal government, in Dec. 1977, announced increases in the unemployment insurance qualifying time and waiting period, and recently promised more restrictions. The provincial government also announced recently that access to welfare will be more rigorously enforced. This is at a time when the number of employable welfare recipients in Kingston has increased to 65 percent of the total, because so many are unable to find a job.

Q: Don't you think though that we have to move a little more towards a user pay principle - at least for working Canadians?

A: Already, many government programs such as O.H.I.P. premiums are not scaled to income. Recent premium increases, of course, hurt those already most hard hit by falling real incomes. A recent study by the Economic Council of Canada has shown that many programs which are often thought to constitute a progressive redistribution of income, are actually regressive. For instance, the one-fifth of Canadian families at the top of the income scale collect 22.3 percent of all unemployment insurance benefits while the bottom one-fifth of families receive only 8.1 percent of all benefits. The Economic Council also stated that, because of rebates through the income tax system, a $25,000 per year wage earner will actually pay only $112 per year in premiums entitling him/her eligible for only $112 per week in benefits.

The National Council of Welfare has noted similar discrepancies in the Canada Pension Plan. Because deductions are determined through marginal tax rates, a $50,000 earner gets back 52 percent of his/her premiums through income tax savings, a $25,000 earner 40 percent, a $10,000 earner 26 percent, and an $8,000 earner nothing at all because he/she is below the tax threshold. The end result is that at $8,000 per year one pays $126 in premiums for a three quarter pension, while at $25,000 per year one is entitled to a full pension although actual premiums are only $101 per year. A $50,000 per year earner is entitled to twice the pension of someone earning minimum wage while paying $10 less. One might go on and on. A recent study by the Economic Council indicates that the gap between the highest and lowest income groups is continuing to widen in Canada.

But the point is that we must also recognize that special attention to particular groups is often necessary in the interests of greater social equality. For example, the freeze on capital grants to Daycare centres not only reduces potential family income, but by forcing women to remain in the home, denies them the right to participate in society as they see fit. This is a real backward step in progress made in recent years... This is obviously true with regard to underprivileged groups in society as well.

Q: But what about education cutbacks? Don't you agree that university students are a pretty darn privileged group in society?

A: That's obviously true. Post-secondary education has always benefited the privileged most. However, the most important effects of cutbacks will not be to shift the costs to those most able to afford it, but, combined with the general economic recession, it will have the effect of further decreasing access to

On March 16th, 1978, over 7000 students and staff from universities and colleges across Ontario marched to Queen's Park to protest Davis's cutbacks in education and social services. It signalled the beginning of an all out campaign to fight to stop cutbacks.

higher education by lower income groups. For example, student unemployment as of July stood at 15.3 percent making it difficult for those students to contribute to the costs of their own education. Further, expected parental contribution now begins at the $6,000 level for OSAP rather than the $7,600 level for Canada Student Loans. Parents of students living away from home will be expected to contribute $500 more on average. The living allowance of students living at home has decreased relative to inflation; while tuition and ancillary fees have increased. Indications are that as of July, 10,000 fewer students than last year at this time will be returning to school. Also, as of July 1, there was a 45 percent drop in applications to Ontario Universities from last year at this time. It is of course those from the lowest income groups who are first forced to reconsider their decision to attend school.

Q: But isn't declining enrolment partly due to the fact that the crest of the baby boom has now passed?

A: No, in fact the 18-24 age group from which 90 percent of post-secondary students are drawn, is still increasing.

Q: Is it perhaps that our economy has just reached the saturation point in terms of post-secondary students?

A: No. Education is a long term need that should never be determined by the momentary cyclical requirements of the economy. Our entire future and the futures of individuals presently affected, hinges upon skill that must be attained now. We have only to compare the 16 percent participation rate of our 18-24 age group in post-secondary education with the 40 percent participation rate in the U.S. to realize how narrowly spread higher education is in Canada.

Q: Granted that we should do something about accessibility, could we not at least maintain the same Quality of education with present expenditures? For instance, Queen's doesn't seem to have been hit all that hard does it?

A: Queen's will suffer a real loss in purchasing power of around 46 percent in light of the present rate of inflation. Queen's is in a comparatively favourable position because of endowments, etc., but some services such as the library are suffering. There has been an absolute reduction of 16 percent in the library budget between 1972 and 1978. In 1972, the library purchased 46,638 books compared to 22,846 purchased in 1978. Along with this, 37 full time staff have not been replaced and operating hours have been reduced. There are also cuts in the physical education center budget, fewer facilities and reduced hours. Student/teacher ratios are increasing, entailing larger classes and less professor contact time.

Q: But there is an economic recession. Even if the withdrawal of these services is regressive, how can they be paid for?

A: Cutbacks do not reflect objective economic necessity, but are a question of priorities. We have already discussed the regressive character of some government programs. An entire series of programs such as the Registered Retirement Savings Plan and the Registered Home Ownership Plan benefit higher income groups much more than lower income groups. Other areas where tax revenues might be gained are the corporate sector. Between 1967 and 1974, the contribution of corporate taxes to the total provincial budget fell from 11.3 percent to 10.7 percent although corporate profits rose by 250 percent. The shortfall was met largely by personal income tax although personal income in the period increased by only 125 percent. The money is there. It has only to be used properly.

Q: But are these really misplaced priorities? Don't we have to increase profits to get the economy moving?

A: A report by the C.D. Howe Institute (1976) indicates that this strategy need not have the desired effect of stimulating investment and creating jobs since "a substantial portion of any increase in net income arising from tax concessions would flow out of Canada." This is because multi-nationals make their decisions on a world wide basis. The Inco experience is a clear indication of this problem.

Q: So you think that minor changes in the tax system are the answer?

A: No. This can only provide a short term solution to meeting present needs. In the long run, major structural changes in the Canadian economy and the development of the manufacturing sector so that the Canadian economy can continue to generate the necessary wealth

But beyond this, what is required is a fundamental reorientation of your economy and concerted social planning so that economic expansion can be geared to the satisfaction of both human and social needs.

Play weds romance and comedy

by Patty Laviolette

Last week the Queen's Drama Department presented W.S. Gilbert's Victorian farcical comedy, Engaged, under the careful direction of Charles Hayter.

Engaged is the story of a young man's enthusiasm for the opposite sex and the consequences he suffers as the result of his inability to devote his attentions to one woman. All three of the ladies involved with Cheviot Hill are resolute in having him for her own. The difficulty Cheviot encounters by promising to marry each of the three is compounded by several factors: He claims to love all three, while the father of one and the betrothed of two others attempt to direct Cheviot's marital intentions to suit themselves. A boundary dispute which ultimately decides the outcome of the play and ensures total confusion.

The play's script is fast-paced and active, requiring a high level of emotional input. However, in Thursday's performance Jack Boschman appeared to have charged his character, Cheviot, with a great deal of emotion from the beginning, rather than working gradually up to this level to create greater suspense and excitement in the latter stages of the play. Because of Cheviot's pivotal role in the play the other players are required to act out their roles on the same high energy plateau. It must be noted that this extra effort did not greatly detract from the quality of the performance, but merely altered the timing of the suspense.

Although Engaged deals with the foibles of romance, it has the strong element of physical love running throughout. During close face-to-face conversations the performers' lips suggested imminent physical contact. Sudden withdrawal from this pose succeeded both in eliminating contact unnecessary to the play's progress, and in increasing suspense and the play's growing sense of frustration.

Technically the production was well handled. The postures of the players were appropriately stilted to enhance the intended farce. Careful blocking created a necessary physical balance during the hilarity of the play. Similarly, the simplicity of the country set in the first act, provided a buffer for the chaos created by the off-stage train accident. The following two acts took place in a Victorian drawing room, with a minimum of props to allow freedom of movement. The character of the set is created by an effective backdrop which included both walls and ceiling in period decor. Credit for this important aspect of the mechanics of the play goes to Russ Waller.

In all, Engaged proved to be an entertaining play, lively and amusing in its farcical and somewhat melodramatic antics. The actors swept the audience up in the excitement of the action and let them down easily with a satisfying conclusion, in which the confusion of the romantic entanglements are sorted out and the lovers are paired off to please themselves and the audience.

If future productions equal the quality of Engaged, it will be an interesting series of plays to see.

Stilted poses emphasize the melodramatic

Belushi: a grunt is worth a thousand words

Animal House

directed by J. Landis reviewed by Nick Gray

John Belushi, as Bluto, steals the laurels in this witty, tasteless movie about a small town college in the early 60's, Animal House. Belushi the blunt, comic, man of few words, anti-hero, takes the audience along on his adventures and antics as he crushes beer cans against his head, pulls off a raid on the Dean's office with disastrous consequences, peeps on the willowy plastic blondes in residence, and starts a food fight in the cafeteria. In a marvelous display of pantomime and working to the camera, Belushi, with a quick flicker of the eyebrow or conniving smile allows his audience to anticipate and participate in his zany stunts. Still he allows surprise for both his audience and himself in a superbly executed scene of reveille.

The action occurs in a small picturesque college town somewhere in the U.S. during that eventful year 1962. Conflict develops between members of the Delta Tau Chi - the good guy flunkies, degenerates, fun loving drunks, including Belushi - and the Omega Theta Pi - a neo-Nazi fraternity of clean cut, all American, serious individuals - fraternities. Delta retaliates in true slapstick style after being hard pressed by the Dean (John Vernon) who has them on "Double secret probation" and the members of Omega who disrupt their good times - parties, raids, theft of examination papers, and fornication - shame.

Through the use of exaggerated subtlety - Jennings (Donald Sutherland) discussing Milton's work on Satan while biting into an apple, or Belushi's King Kong approach to co-eds - the film takes pot shots at everything from Mum and apple pie to sex. Combining bad jokes with superbly stereotyped characters the producers present a film of absolutely no redeeming social value; a film well worth seeing.

Also appearing in various stereotyped roles are Tim Matheson, Vera Bloom, Thomas Hulce and an assortment of fine bit performers.

Although National Lampoon is associated with this film they have avoided producing a celluloid version of their magazine while maintaining some of the infamous style.

New Energy at Bitter Grounds

by Brent Laviolette

One of the new aims of this year's Bitter Grounds coffee house is to introduce a wider variety of musical talents to the Queen's community. Last weekend's "Revolving Stage" presentation provided a perfect showcase for the new management's goal. Performers playing half hour sets displayed a spectrum of music ranging from Country, Bluegrass, Folk (American and Gaelic), to modern popular. There was even a comedy routine to provide an alternative entertainment form.

Despite numerous Frosh Week activities on campus there was a large audience both nights. Lizard Tom Case and the Hard Times Bluegrass Band, always popular in the Kingston area, headlined Friday's show but were unable to appear on Saturday.

Saturday evening's version was highlighted by a number of performers. Marilee Jones and Tom Mawhney provided a multi-talented set demonstrating great instrumental and vocal variety. Beginning with a simple tune on the penny whistles Tom and Mary split the air with shrill, plastic notes, combining melodies with such adeptness that the tune's simplicity took on a great complexity. The resonance created by their perfect frequencies was a unique listening experience. Tom and Mary proceeded through a number of traditional folksongs using an autoharp and a guitar. The Ian and Sylvia song "Someday Soon" utilized the enormous vocal range between Tom and Mary's voices lending the song a richness this reviewer has never encountered on a recorded version. Another fine example of harmony was provided when they played two Scottish Ballads on different pitched recorders. The pleasing harmonies that these two performers sought and attained enchanted the crowd giving the "Revolving Stage" its most reflective set.

Dave Wilson capped off the evening with Irish folksongs, mostly ribald, two children's songs and some English folk music. This set was highly entertaining; the vocals were very good and the guitar lucid and steady. For an encore Dave played a beautiful, sombre version of Bob Dylan's "One Too Many Mornings". Mike Farelli and Wayne Marston played a fast paced set of standard country tunes and popular folk music on the fiddle, guitar, and banjo. Their version of Neil Young's "Sugar Mountain" was instrumentally and vocally superb. Both of these performers handled their instruments well and blended their tones with skill, receiving a good round of applause for their efforts.

Eric Andral demonstrated some sophisticated guitar stylings as the opening act. Singing original compositions dealing with "student life," a genus common to most of us, Eric's lyrics presented a balance of sentimentality and satire.

Ann Bonifero followed, playing the piano and showing a good repertoire of popular music. Ann's own composition "Too Late to Fly South", featured some lovely poetry which she adapted to music with grace.

Diversifying the evening's entertainment further were Steve Newell and Val Cottrill. Steve's short comedy routine provided an interesting break from the musical entertainment. Val Cottrill was billed as the surprise entertainer. Entering the house playing bagpipes Val's Scottish dance renditions were enthusiastically received by the audience.

If all of the Bitter Grounds weekends are as entertaining as the "Revolving Stage", it should be a successful year for the coffee house.

Queen's salut Harmonium

par Denise Gaucher, Catherine Bissonnet Harmonium, un des groupes de musiciens les plus célèbres du Québec, sera à Queen's ce Vendredi prochain, le 22 Septembre à Grant Hall. Harmonium a été fondé en Octobre 1973, par Serge Fiori, Louis Valois et Michel Normandeau. Depuis ce temps là, le groupe, ainsi que leur réputation a grandi énormément. Harmonium est à présent composé de sept membres, et leur réputation est renommée autour du Québec, ainsi que dans d'autres régions du Canada. Le groupe n'a pas seulement donné des concerts au Québec, mais a aussi joué à Toronto, ainsi qu'à Vancouver. Après leur début à Kingston, ils seront en route pour la Californie, et ensuite pour l'Europe.

Depuis leur naissance, Harmonium a enregistré trois albums. Leur premier album, Harmonium, qui a été mis en circulation en Janvier 1974, a été suivi par deux autres, Les Cinq Saisons en Mars 1975 et L'Heptage en Novembre 1976. Leur musique est un magnifique mélange de chansons traditionnelles, de jazz et du rock. Elle crée une disposition chaude, qui évolue et coule, et au cours d'un concert de deux heures, les bons sentiments du groupe se transforment en une euphorie qui peut envahir le spectateur pendant des jours.

Le concert, sera seulement le premier des concerts québécois qui sont organisés pour cette année. Le comité "Queen's-Laval Twin University", qui a été fondé l'année dernière pour établir des liens avec Laval et pour encourager des échanges culturels, a quelques autres concerts tentativement organisés.

Golden Gaels open with a victory

by Don MacKinnon

A large opening game crowd went home happy Saturday afternoon after watching the Queen's Golden Gaels trounce the University of Quebec at Trois Rivières' Patriotes 46 to 7 at the George Richardson Memorial Stadium.

The Gaels, who earned a trip to the Atlantic Bowl last year by compiling six straight wins after early season trouble, were expected to win this year's season opener easily. Yet the smooth-running machine that mowed down opponents last year in the second half of the schedule, still needs a little oil to get the kinks out.

The Patriotes, cannon fodder for most other teams in the OQIFC, succeeded in pointing out some areas that the Gaels need to work on. Specialty teams and the rushing game are two areas in particular that need polishing. "We're just not up to par yet", was veteran Defensive End Jim Muller's comment about the game. Offensive Guard and Co-Captain Randy Edgeworth agreed, pointing out that "We made a few mental mistakes, but we'll learn from them." A blocked punt deep in their own end, missed converts and an inconsistent ground attack, particularly short yardage problems, highlighted some of the Gaels' deficiencies.

Yet despite the opening game errors, the Gaels look like the team that they have been billed as: the one to beat in this conference. Tony Manastersky ran with authority in the first half, as did the rookie Tom McCartney in the second. The firm of Rutka to O'Doherty once again proved that they were the most fearsome twosome in the conference. The Gaels' sophomore quarterback finished the game with an amazing 83% completion record. Although the Patriotes fielded a pathetic defensive secondary, such a percentage is not to be scoffed at. The defensive line appears to be as strong, or stronger than the unit which anchored last year's "Gold Rush" defense. The secondary, weakened by the loss of three veterans, has yet to face a strong passing team, but none-the-less looked solid against Trois Rivières. Two opening game interceptions should boost their confidence.

Queen's jumped out to an early 14 to 0 lead on the strength of a Jim Tutka to Bob O'Doherty 54 yard touchdown, closely followed by an electrifying 67 yard Ted Tyczka punt return. (Having endured knee surgery and hours of doubt about whether he would ever play again, a weary but happy Tyczka said after the game, "That was the biggest feeling of my life".)

Only three minutes and forty seconds had elapsed, and shortly after the Gaels looked to add another three points. Yet a miscue on a field goal attempt which ended in a twenty-five yard loss, seemed to rattle the Gaels. Just before the quarter ended, the Patriotes blocked a Myles Pritchard punt and recovered the ball on the Queen's three. Two plays later, Michel Beaumont, clearly their outstanding player, swept the right side for the Patriotes' lone touchdown.

The Gaels spent most of the second quarter getting the running game untracked. Eventually they got back to their bread and butter as Rutka hit O'Doherty with a 35 yard touchdown strike at 13:28 of the second quarter. With only seconds remaining on the clock, the offense got the ball back and Rutka again went to work on the porous Quebec secondary. Blaine Shore hauled in a 41 yard pass with a scintillating diving catch at the seven yard line.

In spite of the glare of the impressive score that Queens won by, areas of concern to the coaches and players have been identified. Some of the Gaels' problems perhaps resulted from, as Bob O'Doherty put it, "playing down to the Patriotes' level." Yet the Gaels look like a team that has a great deal of potential, and with a little preventive medicine, they should be playoff bound.

One of the very few Rutka passes Bob O'Doherty and Blaine Shore missed Saturday afternoon.....

First place in preseason tourney

Strong start for soccer

by Benny

Queen's Soccer Team travelled to Montreal on the weekend in order to compete in the annual McGill University Tournament. With victories over U.N.B. and R.M.C., the Gaels came away with the first place trophy.

Coach John Walker was understandably happy with the win, yet he returns to training sessions with the first team position still not settled -- a tough task after such convincing victories. Having to choose from 50 rookies and 12 veterans has left Walker all smiles. There are so many good first year players that Queens plans to field a B team which will compete in an exhibition schedule.

On Friday night, Queen's played their first real game after ten days of hard training. "Most of the lads played during the summer but we still have to work on fitness", Walker said.

Against the U. of New Brunswick Queens proved to be overwhelming opponents. Although the Gaels only led 2-0 at half time, they threatened to shower their rivals with several more goals.

It almost became a comical event as Queens tattooed the woodwork seven times. The roof caved in for U.N.B. in the second half as Goodman and McKay sealed the victory.

The host team, McGill, was billed as the top contender for the CIAU championships, however they were rudely brought back to earth by a revamped R.M.C. squad. The cadets surprised everyone with a 2-1 win.

Saturday morning's consolation match proved to be a futile exercise as McGill thumped U.N.B. 12-0 attempting to reaffirm their status as a good soccer club.

Dampened by a light overnight rain, Molson stadium's astroturf was lightning fast when Queens met R.M.C. They were perhaps overconfident as they have not lost to the cadets in the past ten years.

Combating some tight officiating, it took the Gaels 40 minutes to pull even with the 1-0 lead taken by R.M.C. The second half was scoreless due to the state of fatigue of both teams.

Tolerance not a right but a student privilege

Last Wednesday night, Kingston Police Headquarters and the AMS Orientation Committee received over one hundred complaints pertaining to noise coming from a dance in the Mac-Corry parking lot. Music could be heard from as far away as Richardson Stadium, and the next morning Principal Watts was forced to issue a public apology to the people of Kingston.

Both Mayor Ken Keyes and Chief of Police Rice have indicated that the reaction of Kingston citizenry to this and other Frosh Week-related activities was so great that something has to be done. Last Thursday evening, not twenty-four hours after the dance, undercover police dressed as engineers entered two parties in off-campus houses. Shortly thereafter, the parties were raided and ten students were charged with various offences. They are all presently awaiting trial.

The events of this past week serve to indicate something about the nature of student-citizen relationships. All too often, students slip into the misunderstanding that we are isolated from the community around us, and have no responsibilities thereof. We feel that, due to the unique nature of the university environment, the job of maintaining law and order can be handled adequately by such internal agencies as the AMS Constabulary. Students give a great deal to Kingston, some argue, and it is only fair that students be given a week in which they can ignore the law and step on other citizens' rights.

This argument is dead wrong. Students are as much citizens of Kingston as any life-long resident, and as members of the community we have a responsibility to obey the laws which govern it. Up to now, the police — and Kingston residents — have exercised a good deal of tolerance with regard to rowdiness, liquor law violations, and petty vandalism. The word from the top is now clear: they're fed up, and they don't plan to be tolerant any longer.

This does not mean the actions of the police are free from blemish. The Thursday night raids took place without the traditional prior warning to the AMS Orientation Committee. Further, two students are willing to go on record saying that the police raided a twenty-person party with their billy clubs drawn (the Chief of Police flatly denies this).

In general, though, the police are not at fault. Their duty is to enforce the law, and prosecute when necessary. Their tolerance is a privilege, not a right. Students abused that privilege last week, and we have no one to blame but ourselves for the result.

Let AMS know

The overriding lesson to be learned from the recent police raid on two student parties is the need for better advance communication between the AMS Orientation Committee and the Kingston police and city officials.

Admittedly, the events which led to the raid were virtually impossible to foresee, but the end result is that ten Queen's students have been made scapegoats for a change in police policy. It is unfair to them that the change was not relayed to the Orientation Committee in advance.

But more importantly, police credibility among students has decreased. Many students feel the police took advantage of those students who held parties that particular night.

The police force has the responsibility to enforce the law. However such enforcement should be made uniformly. When circumstances necessitate a change in policy, then the Orientation Committee should be informed. If this had been done last Thursday night, an unfortunate incident may well have been averted.

Drop in aid applicants

OSAP applications this year are down 25.7% over last year, and while there is no doubt it relates to the significant changes in the plan there is less consensus beyond that point. Student Awards Officer Rob Merrifield asserts that the drop reflects the closer scrutiny under which a student's financial situation is put. What he is saying, in effect, is that it's not as easy to cheat anymore, so less students are trying.

Michelle Meyer, spokesperson for Queen's Students Against Cutbacks and Unemployment, contends the drop indicates that low-income students, unemployed during the summer and faced with a complicated and unfair student aid program, have simply opted out of university. In other words, only the richies are still here, and they're clearly ineligible.

It's too early to tell whether the percentage of low-income students has dropped, but it is incorrect to contend that this group suffers from the changes in OSAP. In fact, they benefit. The real losers are grad students.

What does this 25.7% drop indicate? Merrifield has the right idea. The new plan requires release of tax information, which means that cheaters have to cheat twice to have a hope of their grant being approved. Cheating on a tax return is a federal offense, so unworthy grant applicants may well think better of the idea and not apply at all. But this does not adequately explain such a dramatic drop. If there aren't many late applicants another factor must be involved.

Here, Meyer has the right idea. This new plan is baffling. Confusing terms such as "eligibility periods", "grandfather clause", "loan remission" and a cobweb of schedules and graphs face the applicant. OSAP is no longer one plan, but four.

It's good to see the cheaters weeded out, but it's bad to see a new student aid program so confusing it turns away eligible recipients.

Anti-cutback drive is underway

by John Baktis

Armed with a new Executive, the Queen's Students Against Cutbacks and Unemployment (QSACU) will continue their battle with renewed vigor this year.

In a General Meeting of the QSACU last Wednesday September 20, the Committee elected Chairperson Sandi Bar, Secretary Cherie Miltmore, Publicity Officer Michelle Meyer, Research Coordinators Dave Wilson, Ian Robinson, Cyd Huard and Liaison Officer Adrien Brien.

The main objectives of the Committee are to investigate the impact of cutbacks on unemployment in the Queen's community and beyond, to educate Queen's students about these issues, and to implement strategies to fight against cutbacks and unemployment.

In the last General Meeting strategic and policy principles were adopted, and these will be placed before the AMS Outer Council for their acceptance Thursday October 5. The motions overwhelmingly passed by the Committee pertain partly to tuition increases deemed necessary to compensate for the Ontario Cabinet's monetary cutbacks on the province's universities and with the overall deteriorating effect of cutbacks not only on the quality of university education but on society as a whole.

One important motion approved by the Committee, as noted in the list of policy principles, is that QSACU "unequivocally opposes any tuition fee increases. Any endorsement of fee increases at this time can serve only to weaken the bargaining position of all Ontario students."

The QSACU feels that cutbacks in general have a "socially regressive character" and that "effective protests be mounted immediately" in order to insure cutback and unemployment opposition at its full potential.

Job market bleak for grads

by Colin Hunt

University graduates can expect to earn 12 percent less than the average industrial wage next year when they enter the labour force, according to data released by Statistics Canada this month.

The information is included in a publication entitled "Out of School — Into the Labour Force". It adds that in 1968, the same graduates would have received 18 percent higher salaries than the industrial average.

The number of graduates peaked in 1977 but will remain high for a number of years and add to Canada's high labour growth. It is stated, in conjunction, that more than one-third of all young people entering the labour force have at least some post-secondary education.

On the other hand, the statistics regarding spring unemployment for those 15 to 25 years of age averaged 23 percent for those with only elementary education and only 5.4 percent for degree holders.

Statistics on enrollment show that the number of students in elementary schools peaked in 1968 at 3.8 million and is now declining to a projected 3 million in the early 1980's. University enrollment is similarly leveling off and shows some signs of declining.

Queen's enrollment dips

by Tim Greenwood

A slight decline in Queen's student population this year is expected compared to previous years, pending final figures and the completion of registration, according to the Registrar, Dr. K.L.S. Gunn. Gunn noted however that "with our first year enrolments we've met and exceeded all our targets in every faculty."

The faculty of education and the department of graduate studies are the two areas which have shown a decline in enrolment. This year 560 students registered for education as compared to 775 last year "the effect of lack of jobs in this area has shown up," Gunn observed.

The registration for graduate students is down from last year at this time according to Dr. Gunn, "but registration by late arrivals could change the final figures he added."

Student fees account for a little over 10 percent of the university funding so the immediate impact of the slightly lower enrolment will not have a dramatic impact on Queen's finances, Gunn explained. The bulk of the rest of the funding comes from government grants related to the total number of course registrations. The effect of a decline in enrolment on grants is "dampened by the fact that it is not felt until the following year."

The level of grant is calculated by halving the actual decline and then by taking an average of the last three year's enrolment," Gunn said. Gunn noted this means only one sixth of any decrease has an actual effect on the level of government funding.

The actual physical process of registration ran very smoothly under the command of Mr. Davies, Assistant to the Registrar. According to Mr. Davies the bulk of the crew working registration are veterans, whose experience and "team spirit" contribute to the efficiency of the operation.

"Our one great concern is to move students through as fast as possible with the least amount of frustration as we can get by on." During peak periods they were processing 340 students an hour he said.

Miss Richardson, the person in charge of station seven, admitted to having worked at registration for "many, many years." She said that the experience of the staff allowed them to streamline the operation a little more each year.

Bob Merrifield, Student Awards Officer, changed the layout of the OSAP station to help alleviate traffic jams was pleased with the result. This year only students in need of assistance move through his station and they do most of their own paperwork in work areas set aside for this purpose. Merrifield's major concern was the number of unclaimed cheques that are taken back to his office every evening. He explained these would be kept for four weeks and then if after a call to the registrar the student could not be located they would be sent back.

There was the customary amount of grumbling about the lineups but the general attitude seemed to be a relief that registration could be completed as quickly and painlessly as possible. One unidentified second year student claimed registration was faster this year "because there wasn't as many handouts and because I'm broke and was unable to buy anything." Mary Boyden, an Artsci '82, exposed to registration for the first time, said her Gaels were very helpful.

Faculty house decision delayed

by Kim Fennell

The Commerce Society is upset over the deliberations which have delayed the opening of its faculty house. An AMS committee currently considering the question of faculty houses will report to Outer Council shortly.

Summer Council put off deciding on an earlier submission by the committee in July.

Dave Brown AMS President and a member of the Committee to Investigate Faculty Houses, reported that two major concerns were expressed by the committee. The first was that a faculty house might tend to foster faculty rivalries and reduce the "unique oneness" which exists at Queen's. The second was whether such a house would be in competition with the new University Centre and diminish the latter's importance.

The committee, consisting of Brown, a representative from Student Tenants in Kingston, and representatives from interested faculties, was struck last April 6, by Outer Council. Terms of reference centred on the "liability of the AMS for the operations of the faculty house and, more importantly, the effect on the student community."

Dave Court, Commerce Society President, who was also on the AMS committee, agrees that the AMS should have an overall policy on faculty houses. He feels it is important because of the possibility of the AMS being liable for debts incurred by a faculty house. Court claimed his faculty's house, "would not be called Commerce House and would have an open door policy; I guarantee it." He explained that Commerce does not want to close itself away from the rest of campus and said rooms would be available for bookings by students from other faculties.

Brown feels the AMS has a responsibility to look into the faculty house matter because it was requested to do so by the University Commerce. Commerce is seeking a University-owned house.

Court, however, feels the issue for the AMS is small and claims, "Some legitimate issues have been blown out of proportion. Only 30-40 people are going to be able to use the place at a time. While there were some concerns raised by the AMS, I think they've been answered satisfactorily."

Arts '82 year elections

by Jo-Anne Stead

Dennis Calvin emerged as president and Jane Watson as vice-president in the Arts '82 year elections held September 17. Between 200 and 250 of the 1,600 students in the freshman class were present.

Other students elected were David Duff as first year representative to ASUS, Sheila Craft as secretary, Don Hutchison as Treasurer, Wayne Murdoch as Publicity Convenor, Heather Gilley as Social Convenor, Jill MacCulloch and Kathy Kredle as representatives to WIC, and Win Kennedy and John Sinclair as representatives to BEWS.

Calvin expressed his disappointment that the elections received such a poor turn-out from his class. He attributed the low attendance to a lack of publicity.

"Getting used to their positions and getting the plans down for the coming year are the immediate functions of the group", according to Calvin.

Enrollment falls slightly in Ontario Universities

by Cathy Hemmerick

Enrolment at several Ontario universities this year is on the down swing while community colleges are experiencing increases in enrolment applications.

Queen's enrolment is down only slightly this year in the faculty of Education and in the Department of Graduate Studies. Dr. K.L.S. Cunn, Registrar at Queen's, does not seem to be overly concerned about the decline.

At the University of Western Ontario, freshman enrolment this year is expected to be down about 10 per cent, according to The Gazette, Western's student newspaper. Dr. David Chambers of Western stated that the state of the economy is the main reason behind the decline, rather than the post-war baby boom.

On the other hand, Fanshawe College, a London, Ontario community college, is experiencing no such problems in its enrolment. The Western Gazette stated that this year the number of applicants at Fanshawe was 14 per cent higher than last year, and the college is "literally bursting at the seams," according to registrar Ron Cummins, it said.

Despite the difference between the demand for places in universities and community colleges, the Ministry of Colleges and Universities has no plans to change budgets in the future. E.D. Kerridge, director of College Affairs, was quoted in the Western Gazette as saying, "It's a difficult problem to deal with. We cannot just cut off the universities or shut them down for the benefit of the community colleges."

Because students in China are so accustomed to doing things with their friends, these students find they have to get used to doing things on their own.

"There's almost no personal contact here", Chong said. Despite the "friendsickness", the four students said they all like Canada very much and are very eager to make friends with Queen's students.

Enrolment may be down, but do I look worried?

Culture shock

Chinese students lonely

by Kathy Orr

Privacy of lifestyle is not necessarily such a great thing, comments Mr. Hu, one of four students visiting Queen's from the Republic of China this year.

"Privacy isn't always good. It sometimes gives a feeling of isolation," he said.

Hu is on an exchange program from the Republic of China, starting his second year at Queen's. Three other Chinese students joined him two weeks ago to begin a similar program. All four have completed part of their university education in Peking.

Miss Feng, one of the new exchange students, feels that one major difference between Canadian and Chinese universities is their attitude towards privacy in living.

"In Peking, there were four to six students living in one room together during our time at university. We were like a family, always doing things together," she said.

"We were all good friends there. Even our teachers are good friends," she added.

Hu was asked his sentiments on the social life of Queen's students. He indicated that while Canadian students achieve a feeling of collectivity by going to dances and going to the pub, Chinese students are just not interested in that.

"In China, young people concentrate their interest in work. We don't drink," he said.

All of the exchange students thought orientation week was really funny. They had never seen people singing and dancing in public before.

"It is just not done at home," one commented.

The students noted that, while Canadian young people spend their leisure time at the pub and dancing, they preferred either watching TV, attending films, or reading.

Sports is a major element of their lifestyle at home they said.

Constable Funds Ok

The Editor:

It is the responsibility of any newspaper to cover events that are important to its readers, and to make sure that what it prints is factual. It is also important that any person who holds a responsible position takes the same care and concern as a newspaper towards statements, to ensure that the true facts are established.

Last week's (Tuesday, Sept. 19) Journal article entitled "56,000 lost in error" by Warren Everson ignored these responsibilities. There are two statements which are false. The first, "...over $6,000 which was mistakenly paid to Constables last year", and the second, that the error was said to be an "overpayment". Mr. Koopman's statement about the books being a mess is true but implies that Mr. Gibbons mis-managed those books and therefore allowed constables to pocket the $6,000! Mr. Gibbons did not make any recordings in those books and last year's constables' paycheques did not include any figures above what each had earned.

I will not deny that "the books", may be a mess, nor will I deny the handling of the billings was often mismanaged.

This unfortunate and damaging loss has made a deep impression on the A.M.S. executive and the A.M.S. Constable staff. The new guidelines for billing and payroll will ensure that an error of this size never occurs again, and I am certain that Colin Carter and the Constable staff will do everything to make sure that it doesn't.

Reader calls for balanced reporting

The Editor:

We would like to comment on the Tuesday September 19, 1978 edition of the Queen's Journal.

While we realize that the issue of the police raid that took place during Orientation Week was of concern to the student body, we felt that it was afforded far more coverage than it deserved. There were three separate articles, two editorials (one on the Opinion page, and one on the Editorial page) and one letter to the editor on the subject. We found that much of the content was repetitive.

We felt that the space taken up by these articles could have been shared by coverage on more positive aspects of Orientation Week. Instead of casting a curtain of gloom on the entire week by only covering the police raids, you could have covered events such as Sobriety and the Grease Pole which had not been previously covered. What would also have been appropriate for coverage was the reflection of Frosh on Orientation week. After all wasn't Orientation planned for Frosh?

In conclusion, we hope that the publication of Sept 19th is not indicative of future issues. We hope that you and your staff will present a less distorted picture of future happenings, and endeavour to produce a more "balanced" newspaper.

Yours truly,

Gordon C. Allan
Tina M. Karel

The Editor:

I think it is a sad comment on our society when we allow our national television network to return from a truly momentous occasion like the peace announcements, to a show of utter trash and self-appreciation like the Emmy Awards.

How can we stop ourselves and our children from being led by transparent heroes such as those found in a television series, when the real heroes are pre-empted? Yours truly,

Queen's Alive

Good to be here

The Editor:

Hello fellow students! How's life? The usual replies range from "the pits" to "super" or the like. It seems a pretty simple question but let's look at it again. We're all glad to be alive. Our own existence is something we often take for granted. But life is something that will never be experienced by thousands of Canadian children, beyond a few short months (perhaps less) in their mother's womb. These children are the victims of past abortions and the thousands that will come.

Many students have their own opinions about the abortion issue, some stronger than others. However, until last year there was no group that represented the pro-life side of the issue. In January of 1978 Queen's Alive became an official Queen's University organization with its ratification by the AMS. In the short period between January and the end of classes in April, Queen's Alive has been active in various ways including television appearances, editorials, and book tables. Thus, despite opposition from various quarters of the Queen's community, Queen's Alive has successfully shown that it is very much alive.

Life is what Queen's Alive is all about. We are just a group of concerned students who feel that all human life has the right to live. On this fundamental right all other rights rest. We see abortion as a threat to this basic right and as such it is a potential threat to all human rights. Queen's Alive is seeking to inform Queen's students that all life is valuable in itself. Moreover, it is hoped that positive changes in the psychological climate, both at Queen's and in the society at large, will be precipitated so that abortion will no longer be seen as an acceptable practice. This change in climate can only come about through education, one function of Queen's Alive. Queen's Alive also pledges itself to offer students, in conjunction with local organizations such as Birthright, the services which pregnant Queen's women may need in order to happily and successfully see through their pregnancies.

Queen's Alive is a non-sectarian organization aiming to uphold the dignity and inviolability of human life from the time of conception until natural death. We would like to extend an invitation to any students faculty members or other members of the Queen's community who are interested to join us or to just come down and talk. Our next meeting is to be held on Thursday, Sept. 28, at 7:30 in the central meeting area of the John Deutsch Center. If you can't make it to the meeting come see us on Clubs Night or keep an eye on the Journal for other dates.

How's life? Have you really thought about it?

The dumb frosh charade no more

by Ross Finnie

One theme of Frosh week which has puzzled and disappointed me since my own first year is that of "Dumb Frosh". More specifically is the pseudo-superiority attitude which many upper-year students adopt and perpetrate over the incoming Frosh. This ludicrous hoax is manifest in verbal slander, physical abuse, inconsiderate attitudes, and general theatrical loathing, demeaning treatment. Most students (at least claim to) give and take this treatment "in fun", while others seem to really adopt the role in considerable earnest. I question the very existence of this archaic and deleterious phenomenon. It is an unnecessary and negative aspect of the week which I think should be foregone in the future for everyone's benefit.

From the Froshes' first arrival in the foreign, and initially formidable environment at Queen's they are incessantly ridiculed verbally and even assaulted and attacked physically to teach them that they are merely dumb Frosh, clearly inferior to the demi-gods in years two, three, and four. Quite naturally, most of the Frosh are feeling somewhat insecure to start with, and this degradation is meekly tolerated for what it is - a part of Queen's about which they know nothing.

There are, of course, several excuses made as to why the upper years should establish their mythical superiority over the seemingly pitifully incompetent, ignorant, and laughably dimwitted newcomers. "Only in good fun" is the usual defense, "Besides it builds 'spirit'". I am not at all convinced by these arguments.

Let me ask; for who's benefit is this whole charade enacted? Surely the Frosh themselves don't enjoy the abuse. In fact, I am sure that it often contributes to the Frosh alienation to which we are becoming increasingly receptive and are attempting to ameliorate. If it's not for the benefit of the Frosh, then are the upper year students really gratified by this predatory aggressiveness? I doubt it, at least in most cases, and where such gratification does result, surely it does not justify this distasteful aspect of hazing.

No, the reason must be that the "dumb Frosh" theme is somehow important to the formation of a "Queen's Spirit" and faculty and year identification. I believe the feeling for school, class, and faculty are good, but are not augmented by the "dumb Frosh" theme.

I am sure that finally ripping the tam down from the grease pole does bring the new Science class closer together, but does the barrage of insults and assorted missiles hurled by the Frocs actually help this spirit-formation? I think not. Doing Oil Thighs on Princess Street might well give the new arrivals a greater feel for Queen's, but does the Gael screaming at them to "Kick higher dumb Frosh" really make the attachment stronger. Again, I think not.

Experience and challenges shared and surmounted, including inter-year and inter-faculty rivalries probably do have a positive and invaluable spiriting and orientation effect; the Frosh do feel closer to each other and more a part of Queen's because of these experiences which are relatively unique to Queen's Frosh Week. I only question the continuation of the affected animosities where one group clearly seeks to belittle and persecute the other for no apparent reason other than to put them down for one ultimate purpose or another, never clearly defined or recognized and usually performed simply in blind allegiance to tradition.

I am suggesting the continuation of Frosh Week in essentially the same form, but eliminating the "dumb Frosh" theme. Put them through demanding exercises including the grease pole, elephant walks across campus, and early morning rises if you wish. Keep the competitiveness and challenges to help create that sense of camaraderie and belonging for those who seek it. But let's cut the out-dated and counter-productive inter-year degradation for degradation's sake. Take them out to the grease pole, but don't throw shit (verbal and actual) at them. Command Oil Thighs to be sung repeatedly, but

Hail, Mr. Free, Sir!

The tradition can be maintained without putting all first-year students into the "dumb frosh" category as has been done in the past.

don't insult them while they are doing it. The direct abuse simple serves no purpose.

We are progressing towards a more civilized, meaningful, and as it's meant to be, more rewarding frosh week. Mutual respect and common decency across years is another badly needed step in this direction. It is now up to the "dumb Frosh" of 1978, now somehow magically transformed into relative equals to determine the reception to be granted to next year's rookies. Think back to your own Frosh week and how you reacted to being called a "dumb Frosh" and having other abuse heaped on you. It all seemed a bit silly and unnecessary didn't it? Next year, give the "dumb Frosh" theme a rest. Tradition is fine, but progress is surely preferable. The onus is yours. Use it to make Frosh week and Queen's a better experience for all.

Lady Madelaine And The Redskins

by E. Caulfield Fleming

One of Ontario's more interesting burgs can be found halfway between Montreal and Toronto. In fact, this city must be quite an important one because it has 4 exits off Highway 401. This compares favorably with Belleville (2), Galt (3), and Sudbury, which has no exits off the 401.

By now you may have guessed that the city to which I am referring is Kingston. What follows is an article primarily intended as an educational tool to help create a greater comprehension of just where the Limestone City's head is at. Copies of this article will be sent to all those members of the Provincial Government who have forgotten life exists east of Toronto. Such a move will substantially increase the readership of this article, with a wider circulation I will become more famous. But all that is fairly irrelevant.

What is relevant is that Kingston was founded in 1612 by Madelaine Vercheres, a French chanteuse. Madelaine was born on a St. Lawrence signoria, the 17th of 26 children produced by Herbert and Lucy Vercheres. Madelaine soon realized that if she remained in Quebec she would be condemned either to multiple motherhood or single Sisterhood. As she was only twelve at this point in time, she felt she was not ready to choose between those two options. Better to go West and get her head together, she thought. So, one day, Madelaine lightly jumped into her canoe and began paddling. She stopped overnight at Cornwall and invented lacrosse. It was also at Cornwall that she met Father Hennepin, an itinerant Priest. They decided to link canoes and travel together.

I should pause here a moment and make it clear that this was 1612, many years before Vatican II, and thus the good Father made no attempt to become a father with a small f. Even if he had tried to get funny, Madelaine would have fiercely struggled to protect her considerable virtue. Besides, it was not until the mid-1800's that Canadians learned how to make love in a canoe.

Upon reaching Kingston, Madelaine and Hennepin beached their canoes and founded a trading post. In those days Kingston was not actually called Kingston, but had some French name which I have forgotten. I think it may have been Chappaquidick.

At any rate, the store prospered, mainly because the Indians, who were the bulk of Madelaine's clientele, were pretty gullible. They weren't into Consumer Protection. The store's motto, 'Steal from Redskins', caught on with the local populace, and even today you can find an S from R store at the bottom of Princess Street, still doing a roaring trade. Some changes have been made, of course. For example, an elevator has been installed.

Madelaine died in 1643 after drinking two glasses of Kingston water in quick succession. Father Hennepin went on to discover Niagara Falls.

Nothing much happened in Kingston until the War of 1812, in which Canada fought our friendly neighbours to the South. I am not entirely sure what caused the War of 1812, but I do know that something indeed caused it. One result of the war was that Old Fort Henry was built in 1815, too late for the war and about a century ahead of the tourists. All in all, a typical bureaucratic screw-up. A military college was also established in response to the American threat. It still exists today and its name is The Royal Military College. The modern-day tourist in Kingston is often startled to see the cadets strutting their stuff around Kingston, in elegant cloaks and little pill-box hats which would have done Jackie Kennedy proud.

One of the key figures responsible for the Conflagration of 1867 was a man named Sir John A. Macdonald. An interesting aspect of this man was that, prior to his Fathering of Conflagration, he was a Kingston lawyer. Sir John A. went on to become Prime Minister of Canada, a position he held until it was discovered that he had been naughty with various railroad magnums. As this is an upbeat article, I won't dwell on his misdemeanours, other than to say that it was really a case of a small town boy being misled by Big City Sharpies.

In Kingston today, the local Hysterical Society has restored an old home called "Bellevue House" and stoutly maintains that it was indeed a residence of Sir John A. Macdonald. However, don't be fooled by the empty whiskey bottles which the Hysterical Society has so cunningly left lying about; Sir John A. never set foot in that house. It was owned by my great-grandfather, who was the local Denturist.

Sir John A. Macdonald had only one child, a precocious girl named Flora. She is now a member of Joe Clark's 5 O'Clock Shadow Cabinet. Flora has never married. Nor has Kingston's MPP, Keith Norton. People are always trying to match them up, but to no avail as yet. 4 will let you know as soon as something juicy happens.

Yes, there is life east of Toronto

Many books have been written about the distinctive architecture of Kingston. A number of buildings have domes, and from a distance the town looks like a bunch of deodorant cans. Many of the houses are made of limestone, which is pretty ugly if you ask me. Give me aluminum siding any day.

There's a big Alcan plant in town, so I may get my wish about the aluminum siding yet.

There is also a university of sorts, a rather silly place which likes to call itself "Queen's University at Kingston". Now why they have to say "at" Kingston instead of "in" Kingston, I'll never know. This misuse of prepositions is indicative of the declining standards of our post-secondary institutions. Walking through the Queen's campus is rather like stepping back in time; the students are very conservative and behave much as their parents did when they attended Queen's, except that today's students might neck a little more.

There are a number of prisons in Kingston and an awful lot of hospitals. OHIP was to be moved to Kingston, but it seems that no one in the Toronto office wants to make the big trip. It may also be that no one in the Limestone City is too crazy about having a bunch of bureaucrats in their midst, either. They have a bad way of corrupting children, you know.

Kingston has not changed a great deal since a weary Madelaine Vercheres' arrival in 1612. The Indians are gone now, replaced by blonde-haired, blue-eyed savages at the university. There are more cars today, and, if I'm not mistaken, the train stops every now and then. The politicians down in Queen's Park may look a little vague when Kingston is mentioned, but let me assure you that the town does exist, a perpetual monument to the wisdom of a young lass named Madelaine.

Kingston night spots

Where have all the ol' dives gone?

by Chris Towe and Frank Mulock
So you thought Kingston was dull! Gentle reader, the summer months have been kind to Kingston. New places have opened and old places have renovated. The result is that for the first time there are pleasant alternatives to the Queen's Pub.

The Hungry Lion, on Bagot Street, incorporating both a dining and discolounge, represents the top end of the entertainment spectrum for the Kingston disco set. Its concept, according to Assistant Manager Cliff Morton, lies in providing the best in service, decor and "contemporary music" - "A place where you can meet your peers without being afraid of having a draft thrown over your clothes"

Morton credits the "social awareness" of many Queen's students as a contributing factor in the Lion's great popularity over the last two years. However it has not relied solely on Queen's for its success. The Hungry Lion has created a strong local following among the young "white collar" set.

Both the Lion's dress code and its weekend cover charge of one dollar seem reasonable prices to pay for the type of entertainment offered.

The owners of the King's Disco Lounge treaded on virgin territory a few years ago by opening Kingston's first disco. While the disco is somewhat more modest than that of the Hungry Lion, (one is immediately struck by the lack of chrome and plastic), Manager Richard Mitchell states that the enterprise prides itself on its friendly and warm atmosphere. He feels that the King's main appeal is to the young working person in their 20's. A 10,000 dollar sound and light system provide the entertainment. But Queen's students have no fear! There is no cover at the King's and the dress code is loosely enforced. The Plaza Hotel has undergone radical change during the summer. The Plaza, which once contained three separate rooms, has been converted into large lounge seating 270 people, 100 of which, we were told, are daily regulars.

Live music is featured six nights a week, mostly in a C and W and early Rock 'n Roll vein. The Manager, Chester by name, has invited Queen's students to suggest any group they would like to see perform at the Plaza.

The lounge, labelled the Pioneer Room, is both comfortable and decorative and offers sold "middle-of-the-road" entertainment and dancing. This year the plaza has instituted a dress code to suit its new image, and image which we heartily applaud.

The basement lounge, The Cove, at the Commodore Motel, has been remodelled over the summer. The stage, which once featured live dance bands, has been converted into a large dance floor with an excellent sound system and ambitious light show.

The reason for the change was purely economic. The cost of bands was becoming prohibitively high. The fixed cost of "going disco" appealed to the owners and the success of the downtown venues convinced them of the safety of their move.

The decision to appeal to the mass taste has relegated the Commodore to the position of trend-follower rather than trend-setter. It is unfortunate to see another live entertainment facility sacrificed at the altar of commercial sensibility.

The most encouraging developments in the revitalized downtown core have been on the corner of Market and Ontario streets. 400,000 dollars worth of renovations have produced a new restaurant,

Rousseau's, and two new bars, each of which should prove to be a popular alternative to the current "disco-overload"

The Shaky Landing, with a seating capacity of 104 is a "funky", comfortable bar replete with Tiffany lamps, carpeting and piped-in music not muzak.

In behind the Shaky Landing, lies Dollar Bill's, named for an old Kingston rum runner.

Co-manager Peter Lloyd, (one of three ex-Queen's students involved in the project, wants the room to develop the reputation "of a quality show-bar, along the lines of the Colonial or El Mocambo in Toronto...with a consistently high quality of musicianship, a place with a little more depth than disco"

The music, to be featured six nights a week, will cover all the bases. A few of the artists scheduled to appear before Christmas include Amos Garret and Geoff Muldaur, the Great Sneezy Waters, and Teddy Wilcox and the Teddy Bears.

Dollar Bill's will seat 180. It has its own dance floor, sound room and a 60,000 dollar computerized bar.

A cover will only be charged for higher profile performers and yes, a dress code will, according to Lloyd, be in effect "positively no polyester leisure suits allowed after 7 P.M."

Entertainment in Kingston has changed in both attitude and facilities. We were told that it is no longer a seller's market and that the idea that a sucker is born every minute is no longer valid. The evidence for this remains ambiguous. We were struck by both the willingness to please and the desire to make a buck.

While there does not seem to be active competition between the aforementioned, (since each appeals to its own market segment), there is now a broader choice being offered. For this, we are grateful.

Renovations continue on the Prince George. Indicative of a new trend?

PROFILE

Sculptor at Agnes talks about his work

by Madeline Mills

"For me, sculpture is the eye, the mind, the hand and the magic", stated the charming sculptor, Robin C.H. Bell, at the 'brown bag lunch' on Tuesday, at Agnes Etherington Art Gallery. "I got to the point in my work", he said, "where it didn't make any sense, it was too abstract and I wasn't touching anyone, so, I decided to make a statement, I wanted to create a theatre". Bell does create a show that touches an audience, both in his work and in his words. "In Italy", he said, I was working with three different materials a day, now that I am back in Canada I am working with my mouth - It is a whole different art form", he concluded, and then he grinned.

This casual, funny and off-the-cuff sculptor has only been an artist since 1973. After graduating with a B.A. from U. of T. he attended a gathering of conceptual artists in Toronto and within weeks after that he had established a studio in Italy. Apprenticing with many great sculptors who live in Italy, his art advanced quickly.

The show at the Gallery now illustrates the progress he has made in five years. As a young artist, Bell has been influenced by Lipchitz and it will be interesting to see what direction he takes in the future. He seems to like working best in marble. "At first I thought carving in marble was hard", he said, "but now I love it because it is honest.

Dylan: old and new in Montreal

by Stu Macleod

On Tuesday night at the Forum in Montreal, Bob Dylan experimented. For close to two and one half hours he presented the capacity crowd with adaptations of old and new material, backed up by the personnel on his most recent album, "Street Legal".

It was not the Dylan of days gone by. Realistically, the audience should not have expected it to be. His music has undergone changes with the release of "Street Legal" which might be compared in their magnitude to those felt when "Blood on the Tracks" first hit the market.

Dylan began with new material and radically different versions of some old favorites. The influence of this three female background vocalists lent a very soulful flavor to several numbers. Billy Cross, the lead guitarist found plenty of room to solo. Unfortunately, in some cases, his frantic solos became almost too heavy handed - at other times they blended well. Steve Douglas added a nice line to the music with his tenor and soprano saxophone and provided some amusing interplay with David Mansfield on violin and mandolin.

The audience's reaction turned from favorable to ecstatic after a version of "Like a Rolling Stone" that was faithful to the original. The crowd became more appreciative of innovations as the night progressed. Of particular note was a tender version of "Tangled Up In Blue" on which Dylan's rhythm guitar and vocals were accompanied by keyboards and a tenor sax.

By changing the temp and inflexion of many of his more familiar songs, Dylan emphasized their lyrical content. He truly performed instead of being content to copy the formulae of past successes.

The second set, which began with Dylan on acoustic guitar, outdid the first. Included in it was one of the finer versions of, "All Along the Watchtower", that has been done in a long time. David Mansfield's scorching violin solo was wildly received. The second set ended with a beautiful version of "Forever Young". Dylan outdid himself when the band appeared for an inevitable encore, clad in the home and away jerseys of the Montreal Canadians. A delirious performance of "Changing of the Guards" concluded the show.

The concert was less emotional than those of the Rolling Thunder Revue, perhaps because the band was tight almost to the extent of being orchestrated in some parts. These new innovations, however, are well worth listening to. The experiment was a success.

Sweven's first issue appears

Earlier this week, a new magazine was to be found along with the usual piles of Journals and Golden Words left in various university buildings. That magazine is called Sweven, and its general purpose is to inform Queen's students and Kingston residents alike about local talent. It is an exposition on artists and arts happenings in the Kingston area.

Sweven will be published four times this upcoming year, although all the work was done this past summer as a project financed in part by the Journal and the AMS. The completed editions will be released each month.

Rugby Gaels off to fast start

by Don Cameron

Queen's Rugby Gaels returned victorious from the season's opener in Hamilton last Saturday. The Gaels' first fifteen trounced McMaster's Mauraders by a score of 22-9.

Queen's tries were scored by Captain Bill Payne and rookie wing Dave Cottingham. Alun Williams, the "golden toed" Welshman, kicked superbly with two conversions and a pair of field goals.

Steve Wilmer of McMaster accounted for the Mauraders scoring with three field goals.

Queen's second team, despite the low score of 4-0, played a strong game against the Mauraders. McMaster was contained in their own end for most of the game and the Gaels set up many scoring opportunities. The Second's lone try was scored by Tim Hyde. Peter McQuaig played an excellent game leaving no rock unturned.

This Saturday the Rugby Gaels take on last year's champions, the University of Waterloo Warriors. Kick-off time is 12:00pm for the Second fifteen game and 2:00pm for the First fifteen game at the Queen's Rugby field, located at West Campus just south of the Football Stadium.

X-Country prospects bright

by Jeff Belinger

The rapid change in Kingston's weather marks not only the opening of the fall term at Queen's, but also the start of the intercollegiate cross-country running season.

The men's cross-country team was narrowly defeated by the University of Toronto, in the OUAA finals last year. The women's team beat out strong teams from Western and U. of T. to capture the unofficial OWIAA cross-country crown last year.

An amendment to OWIAA rules now qualifies cross-country as an official OWIAA sport and the girls from Queen's will be going out to prove that they are the best - officially.

The men's team lost only Bob McCormick from their top seven and will be led by veterans Adam Shoemaker, Claus Rinne, Mike DeGuda and Ian Gale. The loss of the strong-running McCormick may very well go unnoticed as sophomore runners Bob Graham and Ian Harrison, 6th and 7th men respectively last year, will be hoping to outdistance a slew of other veterans and a handful of top rookies for the open position. Rob Livingstone will run his first year of intercollegiate cross-country after a year of injuries.

Ex-Waterloo and Queen's star, Dave Grant, will be coaching the men for his second year and is enthusiastic about the team's future. He has remarked that with such talent it will be even harder to make the first team this year than in the previous year.

The team races at RMC this weekend and are hoping to take the top laurels, as they did last year. The future holds meets at York, Waterloo, Ottawa and Western with the finals being held at Brock.

This year's girl's team will have a good chance of bringing home th

OWIAA championship. Returning veterans Sue Spence, Anne MacMillan and Janet Ames will provide strong leadership for a record turnout of rookies. Coach Curt Bolton feels that the strength and enthusiasm displayed at recent workouts will provide the team with a great deal of momentum as they enter their competitive season.

The Queen's girls won the OWIAA finals last year, but until this year cross-country was not recognized as an official OWIAA sport. The tremendous increase in running amongst the female population of universities and the increase in competitive interest has made it possible for the OWIAA to give full recognition to women's cross-country. Coach Bolton would like nothing better than to take the official championship the first time around.

Athlete of the week

by Ron Jamala

The Queen's Journal, in cooperation with the Intercollegiate Athletics Program, is offering a new feature called Athlete of the Week. This feature has been designed to recognize any athlete or athletic team that has excelled during the preceding week.

A committee of 5 will meet once a week to pick the winner. The committee will consist of Women's Intercollegiate Athletic Committee representative Bev Webb, Men's Intercollegiate Athletic Committee representative Kim Carlton, CFRC sportscaster Roger Gailbraith, Athletic Events Manager Rick Powers, and Queen's Journal Sports Editor Martha Bell.

Anyone interested in nominating a candidate may do so by dropping a slip of paper into the Sports mail box at the Journal Office or the office of Rick Powers in the P.E.C.

Writers!

The Sports Section needs writers! If you are participating in a sport for Queen's, or have a particular interest in sports, contact Martha Bell at the Journal Office. Cover a game, interview a player or coach, comment on strategy in a personal column, take pictures...or come into press nights Sunday and Wednesday at 8pm. Bring only your enthusiasm!

Women's field hockey coaches Nanette Cuddy and Brian Groos have a tough job ahead of them this year, as they form the intercollegiate squads. Twenty-six girls and two goalies attended the trials, officially held last Wednesday afternoon, and the calibre of play showed promise of the excellence of past years.

Positions are open on both the Senior and Intermediate teams as only 11 past players have returned this season, and the rookies have so far been able to keep up impressively with the intense play.

Candidates for the Senior team include 5 girls who trained with the Ontario Women's Squad this summer and they will display their obvious strength Wednesday. It is clear that both teams are in for exciting seasons.

Tim Turnbull interviews Coach Hargreaves
The Queen's Golden Gaels will not repeat as OJIFC-Eastern division champions, unless they can eliminate mental errors and lackadaisical tackling, Coach Doug Hargreaves revealed in an interview with the Journal earlier this week.

On the scoreboard last Saturday,

Coach Hargreaves contemplates the action.

Queen's thrashed Trois Rivières 46-7, but Hargreaves cautioned that a better team could have beaten the Gaels in the same situation. Mental errors along the offensive line and between the running backs and quarterback Jim Rutka may result in less offensive power if a powerful defence such as McGill's were facing us. "This game was a good opportunity to work out the kinks," Hargreaves said, but he hoped that the Gaels' one poor game a year was now out of their system.

For those who actually remember the game, Dave Marinucci had no running room inside. He was unable to display his fine ability to break tackles and gain consistent first downs on quick openers. The Trois Rivières defence was pinching towards the middle and looping linebackers into the gap, shutting off Marinucci, but allowing Tony Manasterky and rookie Tom McCartney to ramble off tackle all afternoon.

The coach expects other teams will attempt to shut off Queen's strong running game, but this game revealed that Marinucci is not the only threat on the ground. No doubt the Gaels line will practise blocking against what in essence was a six man line, then use that knowledge in the next game against the Concordia Stingers.

The Rutka to O'Doherty combination enjoyed an excellent afternoon, with O'Doherty latching onto 4 touchdown passes and gaining 200 yards. Until another team can cover O'Doherty or harass Rutka, this will always be a touchdown threat. "We could have thrown there all day and they never would have stopped us", Hargreaves said.

The offensive weaknesses were plainly evident. The backs had difficulty blocking the blitzing linebackers, which resulted in some sacks of QB Rutka. Punting is still weak, particularly under pressure. Hargreaves said that on Trois Rivières' blocked punt, Queen's players committed four mental errors. This is far too many for one play and simply inexcusable for players of Gaels' calibre.

On the three missed converts and aborted field goal, it was simply a matter of practice and timing, Hargreaves said. "Blaine Shore has the best foot in the conference, there's no doubt about that. We just couldn't get the ball to him, that's all." Shore, Ted Tycaka and Pat Plishka have been working hard all this week so that better results can be achieved in the future.

On the defensive side, the Coach expressed mild surprise. "The defense was occasionally erratic, committing some poor errors, but very obviously has a lot of ability." Trois Rivières was able to move the ball on the ground but never threatened to score as the defence would suddenly stiffen. The Patriotes used a quick screen that impressed Hargreaves so much that he has inserted it into the Gaels' playbook.

Once again, he cautioned that one game does not make a season. "It's stupid to compare scores at this point in the season. Wait until the playoffs are finished." Hargreaves was pleased with team pursuit of the football but said that some of the tackling was atrocious. After spending so much time of practice on tackling drills, he was not heartened by the results.

This Saturday, the nationally ranked Gaels (no. 6) face the Concordia Stingers. Although the Stingers were walloped 53-0 by McGill, Hargreaves said, "It's dangerous to compare. Last year they had nothing to lose, got a touchdown in the opening kickoff return and nearly beat us. The situation is almost a repeat of last year. Since we're playing on a far better field, I hope it won't be as close." McGill looks like the team to beat at this moment, so the Coach hoped the players would start playing to their true capabilities this week and that injuries would not deplete the roster.

Final Note: Commenting on his selection to the Can-Am Bowl coaching squad, Hargreaves said, "Sure it's an honour, though somewhat automatic, since we won this conference last year. Personally, I'd rather go skiing during that week."

Bews: Participate!

by Mark Pentland

The beginning of classes at Queen's marks the start of another Men's Intramural season. Units will compete for the coveted Bews and John Paul Trophies, with hopes of claiming championships in one or more of the thirty-seven intramural sports offered. The competition begins with action in six sports slated to commence during the first week.

M.B.A. will attempt to defend their tug-o-war title, although stiff competition is expected from the Civil-Math squad and the Commerce musclemen.

Commerce 80 claims to be gearing up for the track and field meet on Tuesday Sept. 26th. All units are expected to be field contenders, however Meds is rumoured to be having trouble tracking down a full team.

PHE will defend their monsterball dynasty (they have won the championship for the past four years!) and it looks like Mechanical will provide the main opposition in that two-day endurance tournament, on Wednesday and Thursday.

Individual tournaments begin next week with horseshoes at the Tindall Field pits and tennis starting Wednesday. The golf tourney at Amherstview Golf Club will be played on Friday with its champion expected to come from the talented Commerce 79 unit.

These six sports are an indication of the variety of sports available to male athletes at Queen's. More than 4,000 males participated in BEWS last year, to give the program its most successful year. The continued success depends on YOU: the participant. If you like to play sports and want to get involved, get out and play some intramurals this year!

Learning or money?

Things just aren't the same anymore. Ten years ago, the average university graduate entering the labour force could expect his initial salary to be 18% above the average industrial wage.

Next year's grad can expect his starting salary to be 12% below it. In data released by Statistics Canada this month, the prospect for students entering the labour force is pretty bleak. Although the number of students leaving post-secondary institutions peaked in 1977 and will slowly decline, the totals are still too high for Canada's burgeoning labour force. A total of 605,000 students will be looking for jobs as school winds up next spring, and not all who seek will find.

For the past ten years, the popular image of university as the golden path toward job security and advancement has been steadily eroded by a barrage of cold statistics to the contrary. These latest figures serve to reinforce the claim that such an image is obsolete.

Indications are that the steady thrust of reality is finally having its effect. The general public no longer views university as a gateway to security; many even question whether university is not just a waste of time.

These doubts as to the utility of university are completely justified, if post-secondary education is viewed solely in terms of its job-creating assets. University is more, though, and it is in times such as the present that the point must be made most emphatically.

The university experience provides an individual with the framework into which much of his future is structured. Ideally, it provides the analytical tools needed to cope with problems on and off the job. Further, it instills a sense of responsibility by demanding that students be self-motivated.

The university community provides a social environment conducive to broadening one's mind. Where else can one find such a concentration of intellect? The interplay of ideas that characterizes university is just not replicable elsewhere.

Canada is presently wrestling with political and economic questions that will fundamentally affect its future course. Under these conditions, the need for—and the value of—a university education can not be under-estimated. Our society needs people with the ability to analyze, direct, and chart the course of change. With that formidable task vested in the hands of Canada's youth, can university really be considered just a waste of time?

According to a front-page headline in the Kingston Whig-Standard, foreign students are charging "bias at Queen's".

From reading the headline one gets the impression Queen's is discriminating against her foreign students.

Well, that was not exactly what these students were saying. Rather, the differential fees and the phasing out of such students from research and other jobs in Canada provoked their claims of discrimination.

However, some students did indicate a lack of communication between Queen's administrators and themselves before they arrived in Kingston served to exacerbate the problems being encountered. They also felt other students at Queen's were not interested in meeting with them to understand their problems.

Let's not allow government policy to dictate the relationship between foreign and native students. In other words, we have a responsibility to make Queen's a friendly environment in which our foreign students can socialize and study.

"So, what're we gonna do now?"

U.S. student is forced to depart from Canada

by Eric Evans

As an alternative to facing a deportation hearing, Andy Simon, a masters student in the Queen's geography department, left Canada voluntarily today.

Simon, an American citizen, had been working as an entertainer at the Firehall Restaurant until last Thursday night, when he was confronted by a member of the RCMP, and a representative for the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission. At that time he was informed that he was working in violation of federal immigration laws.

Simon, who had held demonstrator status in the geography department, had a Canadian employment visa that was valid only up until September first. Having spent the summer developing his music he had lost his demonstrator's position and his work visa, leaving him simply with a student visa.

Simon was hired by the Firehall Restaurant in early September and at that time had visited the Canada Employment and Immigration Commission (CEIC) with the restaurant's manager. They informed the CEIC of Simon's proposed wages and hours of work at that time. After working for two weeks with no word from CEIC, Simon accepted his wages. Within a week, Simon was faced by the RCMP and CEIC with two immigration law violations.

After a discussion with a CEIC representative Thursday night, Simon was told to return Friday afternoon with proof of student status. Simon returned with this proof and a legal aid representative. However, since council is only allowed at deportation hearings, Simon was refused legal council at his interview.

After about eight hours with immigration officials, Simon was presented with the alternative of leaving Canada voluntarily and reapplying for a student visa (a one to four week process), or appealing to a deportation hearing. If Simon was to lose such a hearing, he would be deported and refused future entry to Canada — and prevented from finishing his degree. This being the case, he has opted for leaving voluntarily and reapplying for a student visa.

Simon left today in order to reapply as quickly as possible with the hope that he will be granted a new visa. Even if he is granted a new visa in the minimum period, Simon fears that a great deal of damage may be done to his academic studies, his work requiring the use of the Queen's Computing facilities.

Although Simon admits that he "should have seen the papers through" he asserts that he was "obviously not here as an illegal alien. I'm a student. I was taking the right steps through Manpower and Immigration."

Simon was seen by many students during Orientation Week as he performed on the guitar around campus — for free.

AMS Court reviewed

Warren Everson

Outer Council voted Thursday to review the AMS court in response to a rising controversy over the effectiveness of the system.

On a motion by president Dave Brown, the Council agreed to a committee to investigate the court system, which has been under fire from critics who claim the set-up is unworkable and the rate of successful appeal ridiculous.

Much of the criticism of the court originated from last year's embarrassing case in which a fourth year engineer was given no penalty after allegedly assaulting a female student at a football game.

Brian Newby, who repeatedly criticized the system for being ambiguous, procedurally unjust and a hypocrisy.

In addition to that case, the court's authority has been limited by an increasingly high rate of successful appeals. Outer Council was told before voting that if the AMS took no action, the Senate Appeals Board would take whatever steps it could to correct the system's deficiencies. Over the last two years, the appeals court has overturned more than half the decisions of the AMS body.

President Dave Brown believes it is important that the court be

by Michael Allen

Pubgoers returning to Queen's this fall may have noticed a change in pub policy. While it's still necessary to present a student card to be admitted to one of the Queen's Pubs, proof of age, to the satisfaction of constables at the door, is now being required. In the words of Eric Cameron, the manager of the Underground Pub, "by next January (when a new law raises the drinking age limit to nineteen) everyone has got to have I.D. If you don't have I.D. you won't get in."

This new policy evolved over the summer, after the Ontario government's decision to raise the drinking age this 31st of December. While Cameron admitted that carrying proof of age to an on-campus pub may be a "hassle at the moment", it's largely because most students aren't accustomed to doing so. Still, said Cameron, every pub's management is "legally responsible for not having anyone who is underage in the pub" and penalties are stiff. The law imposes a "$500.00 fine and a minimum seven-day shut down".

Since out-of-province students, and those in their twenties, would most likely not have the Ontario government's "Age of Majority Card", Cameron said that the constables would accept any "satisfactory I.D.", such as a driver's licence. Asked if anyone had yet been turned away at the Underground because of the new proof of age requirement, Cameron replied that to his knowledge no one had.

Dave McGregor, Clark Hall pub manager made clear that "starting soon...we plan to do exactly what the Underground does".

The Underground, same as ever.

OFS fall conference at Queen's

by Michael Allen

This week, from Thursday until Sunday, the Ontario Federation of Student will hold its annual Fall Conference at the John Deutsch Centre. A total of 80 representative delegates will attend from 15 to 16 Ontario universities in addition to those from community colleges. External Affairs Commissioner Hugh Dodd explained that the A.M.S. volunteered the facilities of the Centre to the Conference holders because "it would bring the O.F.S. before Queen's students." He urged all "to come to the workshops and plenaries so that a better opinion could be drawn of the role of the O.F.S. with respect to Queen's students and the role of Queen's students in the O.F.S."

In a policy statement Dodd said that "the A.M.S. has put a great deal of emphasis and thought into the representative views of students." He added, only "the A.M.S., the democratically elected body will decide the policy for the Fall Conference based on the recommendations of the Queen's Students Against Cutbacks and Unemployment (and independent student committee of which any student may be a member) and the Policy Advisory Committee on O.F.S. Affairs (a committee chaired by Dodd and under the jurisdiction of the External Affairs Commission whose members are chosen by the Commissioner)".

The emphasis, he said, "is democratic representation of the interests of students through representative bodies."

Colin D'Eca, Vice-Chairperson of the O.F.S., explained that the purpose of this week-end's conference was, "to develop the strategy for opposing cut-backs in the next year and to resolve structural questions within the O.F.S." Specifically, D'Eca said that the main structural concern was with "broadening the representative base of the organization."

Canada on threshold, says Watts

by Elizabeth Dewart

Principal Ronald L. Watts delivered a lecture on Canadian unity last Friday to delegates of the Eastern Ontario Sales Conference held at the 401 Inn. According to Dr. Watts, the title of his lecture, "One Country or Two?" was meant "to indicate what, to me, is the seriousness of the situation."

One of the main thrusts of his lecture was to stress the dangers of complacency on the part of English-speaking Canadians. Since the election of Claude Ryan as leader of the Quebec Liberal Party last spring, Dr. Watts stated, English Canadians have become much less concerned about the separatism issue. We have tended to see Mr. Ryan as a saviour, he said.

Dr. Watts pointed out that this attitude could be dangerously misleading. The sort of federation that Mr. Ryan supports is much different from the present Canadian federation, he said, and it "would require a radical change in thinking" on the part of most Canadians.

In addition, Dr. Watts noted, national unity has been overshadowed by economic concerns. More than two thirds of all Canadians, including those in Quebec, consider economic issues more important than the separation issue, he said. The irony of this, he pointed out, is that we do not realize how closely the two issues are interrelated. For example, he explained, political uncertainty may have a negative effect on investment or on the value of Canadian currency; and regional conflicts hamper the development of a nationally integrated economy.

Dr. Watts used historical examples to demonstrate the extreme difficulty of achieving peaceful separation, "even when that is the intention of both sides to begin with." Because emotions run so high, and the debate on prior differences has been so heated, it takes only a spark to start a war, he said. He added that because of the intensity of differences, there is usually little possibility of provinces achieving economic integration after separation.

Furthermore, Dr. Watts said, the cost of maintaining unity may also be violence. He pointed out that secession movements in Switzerland and the United States erupted into civil war, and federal unity was maintained only by force.

There are several danger signals now present in Canada, he said, which were also characteristics of previously disintegrating federations. Examples he gave were polarization along regional lines, particularly on the issue of the federal division of powers, and increasingly regional bases of support for federal political parties.

Often individual citizens may feel helpless in the face of such a situation, Dr. Watts said. But, he added, "I believe individuals are important in this process, and can do things to influence events." He stressed the importance of popular attitudes, and the need to "attempt to understand with open minds the concerns of other Canadians." More particularly, he suggested Ontarians make a concerted effort to understand the concerns of Franco-Ontarians. This, he said, would indicate to Franco-Ontarians and to Quebecois a willingness to accept distinct minorities, rather than impose uniformity.

Finally, Dr. Watts suggested, individual citizens should make their own feelings known to political leaders. In particular, he said, "we must not fall into the trap of seeing only (the) two alternatives" of the status quo or the proposals of the Parti Quebecois. Rather, he said, there is a need for innovation and accommodation to find other options.

continued. "We look after our own by having the court deal with student discipline," he said.

However, members of the court have repeatedly stressed that using the court as an alternative to the criminal court system is not in the best interests of the university.

The committee to review the court will consist of the AMS president, Internal Affairs Commissioner, Chief Justice and three people yet to be appointed by Council.

AMS, Watts meet with police

by Tom Mohr and Chris Hall

Principal Ronald Watts and AMS President Dave Brown met with Kingston mayor Ken Keyes and eight members of the police commission last Friday to discuss Queen's students - Police force relations, particularly during frosh week activities.

The discussion centred around the topic of street parties in general. The incidents of two weeks past constituted a major part of the talks, but both sides also suggested means by which future problems could be avoided.

Police officials indicated that they act on a complaint basis when investigating liquor-related offences and that officers would continue to use Queen's insignia for undercover purposes to obtain evidence of illegal activities.

When contacted by the Journal, Brown said, "I don't think the future police of the police will be purposely antagonistic. But on the other hand, I don't think they will ignore flagrant violations of the liquor laws."

Brown also told police officials that he considered police actions of the past week to be unfair.

"The point I emphasized was that there had been a breach of trust with the AMS Orientation Committee in that information obtained (from them) was used to obtain a search warrant."

Mayor Keyes suggested students look into arranging for special occasion permits and permission to block off streets for parties as methods for avoiding a recurrence of this year's problems.

In addition, Brown made two recommendations that students can do to help alleviate problems. The first is to provide more organized events for upper year students and the second is to publish relevant sections of the Liquor License Act in the Journal so that students know their rights and responsibilities.

Area fire kills elderly woman

By Tom Mohr

A fire in a university area house took the life of an elderly woman last Saturday. Miss Mary Fournier, 71, of 374 Albert St., was inside her house when a fire broke out in the kitchen. She died in the ensuing blaze. Assistant Deputy Fire Marshall Peter Rapley said that three fire engines were called to the scene at around 3:00 p.m. Saturday. The house was not entirely destroyed by the flames.

"Approximately $5,000 damage was done. The case is under investigation by the police and the arson squad," he said.

Rapley hastened to add, however, that arson is not suspected. "In case of a fire death, the fire marshal is required by law to instigate an investigation by the arson squad," he said.

There were initial rumours that the fire had been in a student-occupied house, but these proved to be incorrect. Students live next door, at 376 Albert.

colleges' administrative structures must be approved by the government, and to date the colleges have been unsuccessful in their requests for the necessary changes.

D'Eca noted that even the Council of Regents, an independent advisory body on community colleges for the government, has come down in favour of student representation on Boards of Governors.

The colleges' Boards of Governors are final decision-making bodies with financial budgetary control. The equivalent body at Queen's is the Board of Trustees, and the student representative is the Rector.

Colleges organize provincially

Staff

Ontario's community colleges decided last weekend to organize at the provincial level.

At the Ontario Federation of Student (OFS) sponsored conference held at Humber College, twelve of the province's twenty-two colleges took this step in order to become a more effective voice in their dealings with government, according to OFS Vice-Chairperson Colin d'Eca.

"The colleges have been shafted. Cutbacks have started to hit home and their fees have been increased unilaterally," said d'Eca.

A six-man executive was elected at the conference to study how to best create a provincial organization.

Primary among the colleges' gripes has been the lack of representation on their respective Board of Governors. Any changes to the

Future frosh

by David Safarian

Even frosh will have someone to look down on after September 18th, as Queen's again welcomes senior secondary school students "to explore our university."

Jim Henderson, Senior Liaison Officer, in a memo to all Deans and Department Heads, asked for cooperation so each visitor will be as he writes, "exposed to the places which will give substance to his dreams", and to people who can answer the visitor's questions. The "several hundred" individual visits are coordinated through the Liaison Office.

Pollution group to explain implications

by Scott Haig

"The outcry against increased chemical pollution has sparked the formation of numerous committees designed to investigate and monitor pollution of our natural resources."

On Thursday, October 26, 1978, the Pollution from Land Use Activities Reference Group (PLUARG), a subcommittee of the International Joint Commission (IJC) investigating pollution in the Great Lakes, will hold a public information meeting in the Wilson room of the Kingston Public Library, at 130 Johnson Street.

The purpose of the meeting is "to explain the implications" of the IJC's intensive five year study of pollution in the Great Lakes from land use activities, "so that the impact on the average citizen will become clear," said a spokesman for PLUARG.

The IJC final report, released this past July, cites agricultural and urban runoff, as well as fallout from air pollution as major culprits in the pollution of the Great Lakes. The Commission places greater blame for pollution on Canadian shoulders than on our American counterparts in the eight Great Lakes states, widely assumed in Canada to be the principle lakes polluters.

Before submitting its final recommendations to the Canadian and U.S. governments, the IJC seeks to establish Great Lakes cleanup as a priority issue. Since the implementation of IJC's recommendations could conceivably require more than $100 million per year in government funds, a concerned and informed public is essential to successfully arrest further deterioration of the Great Lakes water system.

CAREERS

Public Service Canada

The class of '79

This year, austerity measures have resulted in a marked decrease in external recruitment for the Public Service of Canada.

Although our manpower requirements are lower than in previous years, we will still be looking for a limited number of Canada's finest graduating students.

For information and application forms, see your campus placement office or your nearest Public Service Commission of Canada regional staffing office. Your application must be postmarked no later than October 11, 1978.

If you are interested in a career in any of the administrative areas, you must write the General Examination, on Monday, October 16, at 7 pm.

If you are applying to the Foreign Service, you must write the Foreign Service Exam, on Saturday, October 14, at 9 am.

Check your campus placement office for the location of the exam centre nearest you.

Proposal draws fire

Staff

The executive of the Ontario Federation of Students (OFS) has announced its opposition to an AMS policy proposal dealing with an expected tuition fee increase.

According to the Colin D'Eca, OFS Vice-Chairperson, the proposal is unworkable and should not be passed by AMS Outer Council in its present form.

"We are absolutely and categorically opposed to this motion. It is extremely clumsy. A tuition fee increase will decrease accessibility, it will lead to a further decline in enrolment, and it is ridiculous to expect that one can make conditions on how the government can make or use the tuition fee increases."

D'Eca also expressed disappointment in these members of the AMS Executive who drew up the motion.

"Quite frankly, I was shocked and dismayed. Having worked on the cutbacks committee with Dave Brown, Rory Cattanach, and Hugh Dodd, the motion is just not consistent either with what they have said or with what Queen's Outer Council has said in the past."

Other OFS executive members will attempt to be present at this Wednesday's emergency Outer Council meeting in order to voice their objections to the motion as it now stands.

Screwed by specialization Jack of one trade

by Ed Hore

We live in an age of specialization. The age of the jack-of-all trades and the Renaissance man has vanished forever. This was struck home for me not long ago when my car broke down. I opened up the hood, and looked inside. Because my specialty is not cars, this was, of course, purely a symbolic gesture. I went inside to phone the Motor League.

About two hours later a tow-truck with cheerful slogans about good service painted on it pulled up, and a young man with a beard got out.

"What's a problem?" he asked.

"I think the starter got stuck and the battery ran down."

I demonstrated that the lights did not work, and that if I turned the key nothing happened. The tow-truck man looked under the hood.

"Hmmm," he said.

After some tinkering he stood up straight, and said that there was something wrong with the battery cables.

"Oh," I said. I looked at the battery cables, which he was indicating with a flashlight and agreed that, yes, they looked bad all right.

"The cable isn't attached to the battery," the tow-truck man said.

"What we gotta do is to get the battery cable to stay stuck to the battery. You need new cables, but I don't carry 'em."

"Oh," I said. "Well, maybe we could use tape?"

"Could do," said the tow-truck man brightly, as though this was something he hadn't thought of.

"Got any?" he asked.

There was a slight pause. "Any tape, you mean?" I asked.

"Yeah, tape. Right."

"Um no, I don't. Don't you have any tape?"

"Uh-uh," he said.

He shone the flashlight on the battery cables again, and we both examined them thoughtfully. "Could use a screwdriver, I guess," he said finally.

"Yes, maybe a screwdriver would do."

"Got one?" he asked.

There was a dumbfounded silence. "You mean you have a tow-truck but no screwdriver?" I asked.

The tow-truck man grunted and explained, "Nope. Tow-truck's for towing, not screwing."

THIS SPECIALIZATION
HAS GOT TO STOP

GRUB STREET

by colin brown

Joe Clark seems to be smiling a lot more these days. When Joe Clark used to smile, it was the shy, darting grin of a young, inexperienced and maligned leader of a political party with its own built-in self-destruct mechanism which had an annoying habit of activating itself at the most embarrassing times, (i.e. federal elections and leadership conventions). Now it is a warmer, broader, more confident smile coming from a man who clearly has a lot to smile about.

It has been a long time since things have looked as promising as they do now for the Progressive Conservatives. The recent Tory election win in New Brunswick has brought the total of P.C. provincial governments to six (the Liberals have none). Mr. Clark's tax proposals, revealed one week ago, have met with very favourable public, and what is more important, media reaction. Polls suggest that the upcoming October by-elections may show a strong Tory swing in many crucial ridings.

There is further evidence as well. The reason Pierre Trudeau backed away from a fall election was that polling showed that his party would have been clobbered in Ontario, especially in the Toronto ridings where surveys were giving the Tories as much as 8 percent margin over the Liberals. Various surveys have spelt bad news for Prime Minister Trudeau on other policy issues. For one, most Canadians rate national unity as only their country's third most critical issue, behind unemployment and inflation, and the vast majority of people surveyed agree that the government has handled these two issues very poorly. Leadership through our national unity crisis is Mr. Trudeau's most attractive selling point, but it will take a lot of convincing to make Canadians concentrate on that single issue.

Then there is Joe Clark himself. He is one of the most impressive and sincere main-streeting politicians in recent memory, with none of the cynicism or evasiveness found in other political leaders. He introduces himself with his warm smile and most people instinctively call him "Joe" right away; no longer "Joe Who?" but Joe Clark, a credible candidate for the office of Prime Minister.

Pierre Trudeau has exhausted his options and now must call a federal election in the spring, no matter what the polls say. Six months is a long time, and many ideas, attitudes and even beliefs can be changed between now and then. But it is the electoral system which is the only thing that protects Pierre Trudeau now. Soon he will lose even its shelter and be exposed to the Canadian voters for the first time in five years; and much has happened in this country during the past five years.

Fearing Russians China woos West

by Paul D. Tinari

China has gone on record this month strongly warning the west to do all it can to halt the newest burst of Russian expansionism, especially in Africa. One does not have to look far to find the root causes of this apparent siding with the Western powers. China is presently economically weak, politically troubled, and significantly militarily weaker than her Northern opponent. Thus, the red Chinese are understandably anxious to modernize themselves and their industries, and because of their fear of Russian intervention, they have swallowed their pride and have turned towards the more prosperous western countries such as Japan and the United States. This new policy should under no circumstances be confused with an offer of friendship, since there is no doubt that if the present situation changed, Mainland China would not hesitate to change its policies, regardless of the consequences to the West.

A few of the older readers may remember that when Mao Tse-tung was in Moscow in 1957, he asked the Russians in no uncertain terms to confront U.S. 'expansionism' even if such a policy eventually led to a nuclear war. Apparently what the Chinese Communists wanted (and could still desire) was a mutually destructive nuclear war between the U.S. and the U.S.S.R., leaving them with the position of power in the world.

Though many countries have rushed to take advantage of the new business opportunities in China, many more view the change of policy with suspicion. For example, Japan's fear is that closer ties between the U.S. and China may place her at odds with the USSR. Taiwan has the most to lose, because should the U.S. forsake her for improved relations with the Mainland, then it is strongly believed that Russia could move in to fill the Western Pacific power vacuum which would result from such a move on the part of the U.S.

At the end of June, Brezhnev issued a stern warning to the West about attempting to play off Red China against the USSR. For its part, China really cannot understand the attitude which the West has taken towards Moscow, namely, the sheepish way in which NATO has been keeping its forces, which are presently believed to be far inferior to those of the Warsaw Pact. It appears likely that some time in the near future some sort of agreement may be worked out between China and NATO, because the Chinese army is presently equipped with outdated weapons and is in no position to hold back any enemy, no matter how badly equipped.

It should be mentioned in passing that neither the west nor China can ever hope to keep up with the USSR as far as arms expenditure is concerned. The latest figures clearly indicate that more than 35 per cent of the USSR's yearly budget goes directly to arms and weapons, and as much as 85 per cent of Soviet industrial investment goes to activities related in some way to arms production. Perhaps it is understandable why the standard of living in the USSR lags so far behind that in the west.

The Chinese are certainly correct in one statement which they have recently made. They have strongly urged the West to put into effect counter-measures to halt the Soviet and Cuban advance in Africa before the whole continent is overrun. The Chinese have stressed that they lack the ability and the strength to do anything about it, so they have looked to the West for leadership. However, the so-called 'war of liberation' enjoys so much support in the West that it appears that Peking's warnings will continue to fall on deaf ears in the West.

No to fee increases

The Editor:

Post-secondary education in Ontario is suffering from serious underfunding as a result of the current government's policy of fiscal restraint. In an attempt to make up the serious shortfalls in funds necessary to maintain existing levels of service, some have called for increases in tuition fees, thus shifting the burden of educational cost onto the student. Furthermore, many claim that students can well absorb an increase in tuition fees, and that this is indeed desirable in an attempt to generate further revenue.

Such arguments are specious and ill-founded. In times of stagflation, as currently exist in Canada, the ability of lower to middle income groups to absorb even what appear as modest increases of $50 to $100 per annum, is severely reduced. Student and youth unemployment in Ontario reached record totals this summer, and predictions by the Conference Board of Canada are even more bleak for next year. Enrolment has continued to decline, despite a continued rise in the number of eligible grade 13 graduating students, and preliminary statistics from StatsCan indicate that at least 9000 students are not returning to university this year, mainly due to financial constraints.

Repeated research has shown that tuition fees, as well as other economic barriers affect individuals differently, particularly discriminating against lower socio-economic classes and women. Recent surveys (StatsCan and Carleton University survey), indicate that less than 15 percent of the University population is from families with incomes below $10,000, and that their participation rate is declining, (from 13.4 in 1976 to 12 percent in 1977). This calls the commitment to universal accessibility by the government into question.

The impending tuition fee increase can only result in further declines in enrolment. It is significant that the two provinces which introduced increased tuition fees in 1976, Ontario and Manitoba, (20 percent and 16 percent increase respectively), were the only provinces to experience substantial declines in enrolment - 3.2 percent. This decline in enrolment meant $11.9 million less tuition revenue than expected in the Ontario university sector. Further, given the current government funding arrangements which are sensitive to enrolment, such declines significantly reduce the ability of the universities to meet cost in future years.

In praise of hazing

Almost every system produces malcontents, and the orientation system at Queen's is no exception. The problem faced by the upper-year students in absorbing the frosh into the Queen's society, and in introducing the spirit of the university, while producing the fewest number of malcontents, has in the past been solved by "hazing".

A relatively small number of upper-year students prod the frosh into doing all sorts of silly things, and the frosh comply, simply because they don't know what else to do, and besides, it's fun. In order to retain their leadership of the frosh, it is necessary for the upperclassmen to put the frosh in their place. Remember, they are fresh out of high school, where they had reigned supreme as (gosh, wow) grade 13's. However, now at university, they are beginners again: freshmen, the lowest of the low.

To make certain that they know their place, they must be informed, therefore the concept of hazing is introduced, and the nametag "dumb frosh" is applied. In a sense, they are dumb (not stupid, but dumb). They don't know their way around campus, they don't know anything about the university, and university life, and worst of all, most of them, unorganized, wouldn't know what to do away from home, in a strange town, with no friends. When they do comply to the commands of the upperclassmen, they realize that they are sort of dumb, doing such strange things. Yet they comply. They may not realize it but it is their last chance to act like kids, because afterwards they will be expected to act as responsible adults.

Hazing, in itself not bad, is the only known and proven way to produce school and year spirit. The only problem with hazing is the question of degree; at which point in time does it cease to be useful? Fortunately that point is easily sensed by even halfway sensitive upperclassmen before the frosh can even realize it themselves.

Peter Schut

Foreign University Intrigue

Queen's University is a unique experience. So too is every other university, some of them radically different from Queen's. In this light, the Journal will be running a series of articles under the title "Foreign (University) Intrigue" in which individuals will describe what it is like to go to University elsewhere, both in Canada, and especially abroad.

If you are interested in contributing, please contact the Opinions editor of the Journal. We hope to hear about Universities the world over.

We feel this forum is a good opportunity for journal readers to truly expand their horizons, but success relies on your contributions. So watch for the byline, and please seriously consider contributing.

In short, given the suggestion that tuition fees should be differential, and reflect true programme costs, even an apparent modest, across the board increase, to meet 20 percent of programme costs (currently, tuition fees meet 15-16 percent of operating costs) could be disastrous for students. A tuition fee increase can only damage the post-secondary sector further by reducing accessibility, total enrolment and the future adaptability of the universities.

If you are concerned about opposing a tuition fee increase, attend the meeting of Queen's Students Against Cutbacks and Unemployment, (QSACU), Tuesday the 26th, at 7:30 p.m., in the 3rd floor common room, John Deutsch Centre, and the special Outer Council meeting on Wednesday at 7:30 in the House of Lords, where a motion is being moved that a tuition fee increase should be accepted.

Beyond the Books the Booze and the Boredom

a. i.

Amnesty International is a worldwide voluntary human rights movement which is independent of any government, political faction or religious creed. It works for the release of men and women imprisoned anywhere in the world for their political beliefs, colour, language, or religion, provided that they have neither used nor advocated violence. These persons are termed 'Prisoners of Conscience'.

Locally, the Kingston group, under Chairman Professor David McLay, is working to gain the freedom of two youthful political prisoners, one in Russia, the other in Brazil. We also participate in special monthly campaigns when all Amnesty International groups act in concert on behalf of a few prisoners whose situations are felt to be particularly serious. We are involved also in the 'Campaign Against Torture'.

The membership of Amnesty International's Kingston group is quite diverse; a mix of Kingstonians young and old, and Queen's students and professors. Meetings are held once a month, although the various committees may meet more often.

Amnesty International is not a "social" club, but it is an organization with a purpose and the active member will find it most

baha'i

The Queen's Baha'i Campus Club is a group of people who believe in and are investigating the Baha'i Faith. The Club's main objective is to make the word Baha'i more familiar to the Queen's community. The primary way of doing that is by having informal "fireside" discussions where people are welcome to come, ask questions, express their views and share light refreshments.

Baha'u'lla (translated from the Persian means The Glory of God), the Founder Prophet of the Faith, brought his message to man in 1863. The major principles of the Baha'i Faith include the unity of mankind, equality of the sexes, and the independent search for truth.

Firesides are held regularly on Monday evenings at 1 Aberdeen at 8:00, and are advertised in the Journal's "All Around Town". There are frequently other activities, open houses, commemoration of days recognized by the United Nations, such as World Religions Day, and parties. Everyone is welcome to come and teach and learn with us.

flyiing

The Queen's Flying Club welcomes both pilots and non-pilots—anyone who is interested in flying, soaring, hang-gliding, model aircraft, or even hangar-flying. On weekends you can participate in a variety of enjoyable and exciting activities, while our weekly meetings feature films, guest speakers, discussions, and refreshments.

The Q.F.C. offers discounts to pilots and student pilots. Our first meeting is Wed., Sept. 27, in Jeffery 118 at 7:30pm, and thereafter on Mondays in the P.E.C., room 205 AB, at 7:30pm.

Come and discover the joys of flight!

socialist

The Socialist Union was formed in 1976 as a broad coalition of socialists of various tendencies to provide an organizing center for social, educational and political activity for socialists at Queen's.

The Socialist Union developed out of a group of student activists (the Socialist Coalition) who contested the 1975 A.M.S. elections—generally recognized as the most issue oriented and controversial elections held at Queen's in decades.

Since then members of the Socialist Union have been involved in activities such as the Women's Movement, the campaign against differential fees increases for foreign students, the campaign protesting the refusal of the Canadian government to grant Andre Gunder Frank a visa to attend a Queen's conference, organization of Queen's support for the October 14, 1976 General Strike against Wage Controls, and the organization of speakers and public meetings on a variety of issues.

More recently the activities of members of the Socialist Union have been concentrated on unemployment and cutbacks.

Aside from political activities, the Socialist Union is concerned with bringing socialists together informally through social functions and study groups.

To join or learn more about the socialist Union phone 542-5033 or write to 120 Yonge St.

skydiving

Why would people jump from a perfectly good airplane? For some it is the challenge, others wish to conquer an irrational fear—the reasons are numerous. Safety is practiced by all and the sport is highly regulated in that respect. Skydiving isn't for everyone but you never know until you've tried it. So if you are looking for something to break out of the dull school routine try skydiving—the ultimate thrill in sport.

The Queen's University Skydiving Club is one of the larger clubs on campus and is one of the oldest such clubs in Canada. Its main function is to introduce Queen's students to the sport, offer aid to more experienced jumpers and to promote the sport parachuting in general throughout the University.

All the skydiving is done twenty miles away at Gananoque Airport every weekend of the year. The first jump instruction, about a four-hour course, will be conducted Thursday nights in the Phys. Ed. Centre and is taught by a highly experienced jumper. The first jump is the Union, where you can also obtain your membership. For more information contact Geoff Bannister, at 549-7016.

outing

Queen's Outing Club is designed to get people within the university together who are interested in outdoor recreational activities such as canoeing, hiking, backpacking, orienteering, biking, cross-country skiing, snowshoeing, winter camping, caving, etc.

Any full- or part-time student or professor of Queen's University (or spouse of one of the above) may become a member of the Q.O.C. on payment of the membership fee, which was six dollars last year.

We have tents, sleeping bags, backpacks, cross-country skis, boots and poles, plus other smaller items. The member is entitled to use the equipment owned by the club, with priority given to those going on group outings.

The Executive, as well as the general membership, plans and runs a great variety of trips each year, depending on the experience and enthusiasm of the members involved.

which are held at the Grey House every Friday at 8:00pm, and everyone is welcome. We also hold monthly parties and occasional dances. Information about all of the services and activities as well as counselling services are available through our telephone service which operates from 7-9pm Monday to Friday. Our office is on the third floor of the Student Affairs Centre (547-2836).

debating

Throughout history smart animals who can talk have dominated dumb animals who cannot. Richard Nixon talked the American public into believing an "inoperative statement" was somehow different from a lie; Brer Rabbit talked Brer Fox into throwing him into the briar patch; and Cleopatra talked Anthony into throwing away the Roman Empire to marry her.

Man, as the most garrulous of the monkeys, has easily maintained his position at the top of the evolutionary totem pole. But now, in these days of dedicated zoologists and avant-gard education, a celebrity gorilla with a working vocabulary of some 600 words is better equipped to communicate than many high-school graduates. Small wonder that we of the Queen's Debating Union, a group dedicated to blarney, see ourselves as not just a central pillar in the academic cloister but as the keystone in the arch of civilization.

During the year the Union sends teams to tournaments in Ontario, Quebec and the North-Eastern United States, tournaments characterized by eclectic debauchery and cut-throat rivalry (a favorite tactic being to drink an opponent into his grave the night before his big speech). For those with less time or weaker constitutions there are a series of informal debates held at Queen's.

At our first meeting, on Wednesday, September 27, at 7:30 in the third floor common room in the John Deutsch Centre, we will present a debate which, if it neither amuses you nor entertains you, may at least convince you to take up debating yourself to ensure that it is done properly. Anyone who enjoys the sound of his own voice is well on his way to becoming a debater.

Remember that without language there can be neither thought, nor liberty, nor social success. If, one day, having neglected to develop your command of the spoken word, you find an educated orangutan promoted above you, don't say we didn't warn you.

and more

To find out more about the other clubs at Queen's come to Clubs Night, Tuesday, September 26, from 8 to 11pm in Grant Hall. Representatives from each club will be there to discuss their activities.

q.h.a.

The Queen's Homophile Association has three main objectives:

- 1) to combat homophobia and sexism, and
- 2) to provide social services and outlets for gay people at Queen's and in the larger Kingston community, and
- 3) to assist individuals in coming to terms with their own sexuality, or someone else's. In pursuit of these goals we work in the political arena seeking the removal of laws which are prejudicial to gays and urging governments to legislate protection for our human rights.

Considerable emphasis is placed on educational aspects as well. Seminars and teach-ins are given on request and a resource library is maintained for the use of any interested person. Telephone and personal counselling services are available and a monthly newsletter is published.

QHA sponsors a number of social events including weekly drop-ins

Harmonium's first stop proves a success

Valois, Fauteux, Local, Farmer, Stanley, Subirana, Fiori - Harmonium

by Frank Mulock

Before last Friday night the seven members of Harmonium has not played their fall show together in over a year. That sabbatical did not seem to have bothered them as the septet displayed dazzling form in winning over the support of the 1,800 faithful gathered at Grant Hall for their two performances.

The setting was perfect. It is a positive joy to be able to attend a concert these days without having to feel like you have just stepped into a war-zone. How many times have you had to line up in the past year to pay eight dollars for the "privilege" of being able to sit on the beer-soaked floor-boards of some hockey arena, a hundred yards away from the stage, jammed in with hundreds of pre-pubescent "music-lovers" whose chief interest seems to lie in preparing themselves for the concert by ingesting obscenely huge quantities of unknown substances so that they can double-over and crash out on the floorboards?

This was decidedly not the case on Friday evening. Harmonium feels no need to enhance their music by coming out in drag, spewing fire from their collective lips. Their music is placed out-front where both the group and their audience seem to prefer it.

Musically, Harmonium covered all the bases—folk, rock, and jazz were all incorporated into the performance with ease. The versatility of the septet was quite something—Fiori would open on acoustic, a line would be passed over to Subirana on sax, he would play it and toss it over to Serge Local on keyboards, (looking like the fourth musketeer and, incidentally, making his touring debut with the band), who would take the recycled theme and pass it back to Fiori.

Fiori, co-founder and lead-singer of the group, dominated the proceedings. From the first strains of his acoustic duet with Monique Fauteux, the crowd was on his side. Fears that the group would not be able to hold the crowd's attention with a program consisting entirely of French songs vanished quickly. This was Harmonium's audience—they knew the music, they knew the lyrics, this group could do no wrong!

Unlike the last tour which only featured music from the Z'heptade album, Friday night's performance featured material culled from all three Harmonium releases, as well as a few cuts from the excellent Serge Fiori-Richard Seguin (of Beau Dommage fame) collaboration—Deux Cents Nuits à l'heure.

One thing that particularly impressed was the hard edge exhibited by the band in many of their songs. On record their music flows together very smoothly, it rarely hits hard. While the group is obviously not interested in competing with the likes of Led Zep and co., the rock-tinge provided by guitarist Robert Stanley and the underpinning of the rhythm section of Messrs. Valois and Farmer came as a nice surprise. A few rough edges were exposed which made for a good mix.

The audience left happy, the promoters left happy, and as you can read in the accompanying interview, Harmonium left happy. Kudos are extended to the QEA for performances of this calibre continue to be brought in and if the antiseptic sincerities of certain Toronto folk artists can be avoided, it should be a great year for all concerned.

Harmonium interview follows on page 17.

'Best foreign film' arrives

Signoret fabulous as Mme. Rosa

MADAME ROSA

Reviewed by Andrew MacBean
Directed by Moshe Mizrahi

It is with very good reason that a foreign film is widely distributed across North America and that it is bestowed the honours of an Academy Award as the best foreign film of the year. It is sheer fortune that this film has come to Kingston.

Madame Rosa, which opened at the Odeon last week, is quite simply one of the most moving, sensitive, and more importantly, honest films to come out in years. At a time when our cinematic palates have been over-fed with re-incarnations, disasters, and "jokes our folks never told us", it is with pleasure that we taste a truly remarkable film.

In Mme. Rosa, we are presented with a compelling portrayal by Simone Signoret of an elderly woman as she tries to cope with the pressures of raising the deserted children of prostitutes, and more-over, her failing health. An ex-streetwalker herself, this strong-willed woman lavishes a grandmother's protection and affection on her brood of illegitimate kids. Most of all, she loves a handsome and pensive lad named Momo (short for Mohammed) whom she has raised since he was three. The boy, in turn, worships the ground she walks on, although his sharp adolescent intelligence often detects holes in her logic.

Perhaps the film could best be called "Mme. and Momo", for in essence it is about how the two must face her impending death and Momo's growing up. For Mme. Rosa, her death is a release from her past—the wartime horrors of Auschwitz and the struggling for money to feed her children (who she finally has to send away). For Momo, it is the frightening realization that he may live a "life without love" — for in her death he will lose their powerful mutual devotion and ultimately his innocence.

While one might think such a story would move slowly and pretentiously, one finds quite the opposite. Israeli director Moshe Mizrahi keeps the film going rapidly — almost too rapidly — as scenes unashamedly proceed quickly (often with much humour) in an effort to get us to know and appreciate Mme. Rosa and Momo. In this sense, Mizrahi retreats from emotional scenes, never allowing the film to slide dangerously in the direction of sentimentality. Unfortunately, at times he prevents us from pouring out our emotions where we would like to.

The power in the film comes from Simone Signoret, once a ripely mature seductress in ROOM AT THE TOP (1958), now she is as shrewd as a lizard, capable of stealing the smallest moment, and milking it to the fullest. Whether she's sneaking a cigarette, beaming out sympathy, or giving a delicious second glance to a 100 Franc note she's shredded to teach Momo a lesson, Signoret keeps you riveted to the small changes of mood registering in her face, the expressive hesitancy in her hands, and the impatient shrugs of her shoulders.

Mme. [Simone Signoret] and Momo [Sammy Ben Youb].

Youb, a teenage actor of fantastic talent. Playing Momo with arresting subtlety and discipline, his characterization is not a craftily assembled series of "takes". Time after time, this young actor achieves a finely painted emotional canvas before our eyes in one continuous shot; the camera, and the audience watch him unblinkingly. His duo scenes with Signoret are absolute Coup de Theatres achieving a brilliance in subtlety and honesty that make them experiences to remember. Finally, of special mention are the "lesser" characters in the film; the pimps, the male hustlers, the hookers and the transvestites who inhabit the demi-monde in which Mme. Rosa and Momo live, and who rescue and support the two in their tragic hours. All are played with unyielding honesty — the strongest quality of the film — and are given a welcome realism that transcends the Lisa She-wolf's, the Sally Bowles', and the Rocky Horror Frankenfurters.

Make way for the Etrog

by Nick Gray

Along with the usual mishaps the Canadian Film Awards went ahead this past week in Toronto at the Festival of Festivals. The big winner this year was the film 'Silent Partner' which received a total of six Etrogs, — the Canadian equivalent of an Oscar.

Silent Partner, a comedy, which is currently playing successfully in a number of theatres in London, England but which has yet to be released in Canada won best picture, for producers Garth Drabinsky, Joel Michaels, and Stephen Young; best director, Daryl Duke; sound editing, Bruce Nyznik; original music, Oscar Peterson; and editing, George Appleby. Filmed in Toronto last year the film stars Susanna York, Elliot Gould and Christopher Plummer.

Reactions from Toronto were mixed, as the general exuberance of the film awards was tempered by the quality of production exhibited. The Awards were presented this year as a part of the Festival of Festivals, which has the honor of being the world's largest film festival and has received a great deal of prominence from the traditional world cinematographic center, Hollywood. Many people feel that this prominence is very beneficial to the Canadian film industry. There is some concern though, that the current structure relies too heavily on the technical end of filming and too little on the more prominent production, direction and acting categories. The result is a certain deficiency in the development of our overall film industry. However, there can be no doubt that the last decade has seen a dramatic rise in the development of film production in this country.

Other awards presented included Best Actor: Richard Gabourie, 'Three Card Monte'. Best Actress: Helen Shaver, 'In Praise of Older Women'. Best Supporting Actor: Henery Beckman, 'Blood and Guts'. Best Supporting Actress: Marilyn Lightstone, 'Blood and Guts'. Best Documentary: Donald Brittain, 'The Champions'. Wendy Michener Award: Richard Gabourie ('Three Card Monte'). Grierson Award: Donald Brittain, ('The Champions').

Two special awards were also presented at the Festival of Festivals. The first to Fred Schepisi, Australian director of 'The Chant of Jimmie Blacksmith', and the second to Claudia Weill's 'Girl Friends', selected as the most popular film as selected by the general public.

Harmonium Interview

JOURNAL: Is there any particular reason why the band chose to only play college dates before heading down to do your American tour?

DENIS FERMER (percussion): We needed a place outside of Quebec to start the wheel again because we've been off for quite awhile.

JOURNAL: Did the audience reaction you received here surprise you at all?

SERGE FIORI (lead-singer and group leader): Well, I can't say no. It always surprises me. We don't change, we just come as we are and just do it. It must be hard for anyone to listen to French music for two hours like it is for us when we go to see an English band, but it's nice to find it's being done — just sitting down and listening, that is what surprises me.

JOURNAL: Do you find any differences playing to an English rather than a French audience?

LIBERT SUBIRANCE (saxes, clarinets, and flutes): Not necessarily. We've felt quite at home with English audiences; it's different in that I guess it's more exotic for ourselves.

JOURNAL: How does it feel playing two concerts in one evening?

LIBERT: I don't dislike the idea. I like the fact that we get a chance to do it again.

JOURNAL: In Grant Hall you are only playing to about 900 people each show. How do you like performing in the big arenas?

LIBERT: I don't think it's a situation any of us really like. Maybe we fool ourselves at times by being impressed with the feeling in such places, but all those shows end up as events. They are more a manipulation of the public itself, more of a sporting event than an actual music show. Our best concerts are in concert halls, in a concert or recital atmosphere, that's where we're at our best.

JOURNAL: I understand that the group is going to California next week to open "Quebec Week" at the Berkley Campus. How are you approaching the trip?

SERGE: We'll try to stay the way we are. We're not impressed with the whole thing, we just want to go and play and see if the people like it... we don't want to get into the American circuit, there is a tendency there to grab bands and use them up. When we come back we'll decide what we want to do.

JOURNAL: What is Premier Levesque's role in this "week"?

LIBERT: He's opening. He is part of the cultural, industrial, economic week in San Francisco and he will be giving an opening speech. We open the week of the shows.

JOURNAL: Does Harmonium have any particular political affiliation?

SERGE: No. Now we're doing a gig with the Parti Quebecois in L.A., this is a cultural matter... it is not a question of being pro-Quebec against the rest, it's just that finally French culture is being looked at and listened to, and for us that's what is important as far as culture is concerned.

LIBERT: We are a Quebec group. I don't think we're doing politics while we're performing.

JOURNAL: What are the main musical influences on the band?

LIBERT: Harmonium!

JOURNAL: Has there been pressure to record an English album?

MONIQUE FAUTEUX (vocals and keyboards): No pressures...big suggestions.

JOURNAL: Are you considering it?

LIBERT: No, because we don't sing in English and the main singers in the group write in French, so it's hard to change that. If tomorrow Bob (Robert Stanley, electric guitarist in the group) decided to write a song and sing it, I'm sure he will write and sing it in English and we'll do it, it'll have to be that type of approach.

JOURNAL: When can we expect a new Harmonium album?

SERGE: We're not really sure about anything because it's really a comeback now (the group has just finished a one-year sabbatical), we're checking a lot of things, we're taking notes about what we want to do.

LIBERT: I have a feeling it will be a conceptual thing. I don't think we'd do it any other way... we're supposed to have a total collaboration — the seven of us, if we can funnel things through.

JOURNAL: What about possible solo projects?

SERGE: I hope we do more "adventures", there are things we want to try — acoustic things, very different from what we're doing, very improvisational.

JOURNAL: One final thing, how are decisions made in such a large group?

DENIS: Harmonium is a very strange thing, a very slow-moving thing, it has been for five years, it only started with three members, only two originals remain... it takes time.

LIBERT: It takes several years... it's total anarchy.

JOURNAL: But you seem to keep rolling along.

LIBERT: Sometimes the road is bumpy!

SERGE: If there is anything going wrong we sit down and talk about it... it's very, very open.

—Details soon about when the above interview will be broadcast on C.F.R.C.

by Brent Lavictore

In the past, particularly in rural parts of North America, traditional folk music was an integral part of family life and was passed on from generation to generation by ear and mouth. With the advent of modern technology music has developed into an enormous industry and is more readily accessible. Even in rural areas there are far fewer who indulge in musical pastimes as a form of entertainment. In the sixties the coffee house provided a Bohemian atmosphere for live music and the friendly exchange of ideas. Much of that same spirit survives today and the folk tradition depends on it for survival as a popular musical form.

The philosophy which lies behind the folk tradition, the philosophy which gave birth to the coffee house, is alive and active. This philosophy is simply a dedication to live music. The commitment to live music which Bitter Grounds has made, like many other coffee houses, ensures the continuation of the folk music tradition.

In previous years Bitter Grounds has gained a reputation as a high quality but financially plagued entertainment establishment. But, according to new manager Liz Dixon, aggressive marketing and a wider variety of musical performers could turn things around for the coffee house this year. A series of radio advertisements on Y-98 as well as new operational concepts should secure their financial situation. "We are diversifying the types of music to be showcased at Bitter Grounds this year. We want to reach out to a larger audience and, conversely, we are hoping to attract more local talent from outside of the student community."

A preview of forthcoming entertainers bears out Ms. Dixon's claim that the coffee house will appeal to a greater collection of musical tastes. Among those scheduled to appear are Dave Essig, the Cody Bluegrass Band, the Wilham Stringband, the Queen's Jazz Ensemble, the Dixie Flyers, the Bill Joslin Band, Stan Rogers, Lizard Tom Case, the Hard Times Bluegrass Band, and seventeen year old fiddling champion Ricky Cormier. There are also several special nights planned which will feature Classical, Blues, and traditional folk music, poetry readings, as well as a children's evening of entertainment.

Even the look at Bitter Grounds is new this year. Gone are the faded posters of previous entertainers; they've been replaced by matted real scene prints. Two wagon wheels and a quilted applique of the Bitter Grounds logo complete the decor changes and add warmth to the overall atmosphere. Ms. Dixon has also introduced a new dress code for the waiters, waitresses and bartenders which compliments the Bitter Grounds colour scheme.

All of the Bitter Grounds staff are volunteers it should be noted. The primary motivating factor for people to give up their Saturday and Sunday evenings has to be a dedication to the live music creed. This also helps to keep the admission charge to a minimum. For less than the price of a movie ticket you can enjoy a full evening of live music in an intimate surrounding at Bitter Grounds.

This year's biggest and most exciting innovation will be the Saturday Afternoon Picking Parlors. Last Saturday's session featured a guitar styles workshop conducted by Roger James, a ragtime specialist. The collective jam session which followed drew many performers of various talents and even those who were struggling with their instruments (myself included) enjoyed the experience of playing with professional musicians. Future workshops will include Banjo picking with Larry Miller of the Cody Bluegrass Band and guitar making with Oscar Graf (see the feature on Oscar in Swen).

If you play an instrument, sing, or if you would just like to come and listen, drop by, the bar will be open and some good live music is available for the asking.

Wide range of talents the key for Theatre 5

by Vickie Steele
Theatre 5, Kingston's versatile professional company is opening their new season. A diverse selection of plays, promising good entertainment makes up the bill.

Shaw's Candida opens the season on October 17th through 29th. This comedy is the story of a young man falling in love with an older woman, bringing morality into conflict with passion. What You Will plays January 16th through 28th, presenting Theatre 5's own anthology of Shakespeare's colourful works. March brings an adaptation of Hans Christian Andersen's tale, The Fellow Traveller, designed to delight both children and adults. The final show in May 1979 is a mystery. The company is searching for the right new Canadian play to perform for Kingston audiences. The Season promises to be a lively success.

The troupe of five players is widely experienced in touring and in versatility of style. Their talents run from writing, singing, mime, dance to comic acting. They have just returned from performing to audiences at the Edinburgh Festival Fringe in Scotland. They have played at the National Arts Centre, the Ontario Science Centre and in many towns throughout the province of Ontario.

Valerie Robertson, the artistic director, was trained in England and also initiated the Domino Theatre Kingston's amateur theatre. Gordon Robertson and John Taylor are established members of the company while Marybeth Rubens and Michael Roades provide new, youthful talent.

This season is available by subscription at a savings of 25%. Queen's students have a special offer at $7.50 for the first three shows. An additional Early Bird Bonus is available to all those who subscribe before September 30th. Dinner at the Buttery in the Hotel Frontenac will be provided before each show at two for the price of one. It sounds like a good deal.

Theatre 5 is situated at 370 King Street West on Lake Ontario. If you have any questions you can call Vickie Steele at 547-6165 or Theatre 5 at 546-5460. See you there.

Golden Gaels sting Concordia

by Don MacKinnan

George Richardson Memorial Stadium may soon be known as a graveyard for visiting football teams. Including last season, the Gaels' 52-0 drubbing of the Concordia Stingers Saturday afternoon was their fourth victory in a row in the friendly confines of the blue, gold and red bleachers.

Another tune-up for next week's battle against McGill, the Gaels this past weekend looked to have improved greatly since their performance of a week earlier. Saturday's contest was never really in doubt. Concordia did not get the ball across the center field stripe until the second half, and the Gaels' offense did not have to punt until the third quarter.

Defensively, John Vernon's return to one of the corner linebacking positions, and Bruce Balson's exceptional transition from a deep back to a corner linebacker has solidified the Gaels' linebacking.

The loss, through injury, of all-Canadian Dick Bakker, from the defensive line early in the game, did not noticeably weaken the front four (Bakker's injury should not keep him out of next week's game against McGill). Veteran Ross Francis enjoyed a fine game spending almost as much time in the Stingers' backfield as their backs did. Succinctly summarizing the play of the defensive line, defensive captain Jim D'Andrea quipped, "they had a great game."

Offensively, Bob O'Doherty chalked up another couple of touchdowns to bring his season total to six. His, and the Gaels' first came with 4-11 to go in the opening quarter on a three yard plunge. The touchdown was set up by Dave Marinucci bulldozing his way through would-be tacklers for a thirty-three yard gain after taking a desperation Rutka pass. Bruce Balson's touchdown less than a minute later (when he rammed thirty yards after recovering a Concordia fumble) was followed before the end of the first quarter by a Rutka to O'Doherty ten yard touchdown strike.

The Gaels defense forced a Concordia fumble on the Stingers next series of plays. Rutka then directed the offense on a forty three yard drive that ended with Dave Best on the receiving end of a perfectly thrown ten yard touchdown pass. Less than a minute later the defense gave the ball back to the offense by recovering another Concordia fumble, this time on the twenty four. Two plays later, Rutka on the option right, cut inside, broke two tackles and raced twenty three yards into the end zone. The Gaels had managed to score five touchdowns in under seven minutes. Coupled with an early single the five converted touchdowns made the score 36-0 for the Gaels. With over twelve minutes to go in the quarter, the coaches started to substitute freely.

First half scoring was wound up by a 20 yard Blaine Shore field goal. Bob Mullen, the new Gaels quarterback had hit Bob O'Doherty with a 44 yard strike to set up the score.

In the second half, the Gaels game plan was to run. "We only wanted to pass to maintain possession" explained coach Hargreaves after the game. "Though the running game is still not as strong as we'd like", the coach was pleased that the Gaels outstanding fullback, Dave Marinucci was able to run inside. On a quick opener up the middle, Dave exploded through the line for a 38 yard gain. That run set up a five yard touchdown pass to Paul Shugart at 8:45 of the third quarter, making the score 46-0. Marinucci finished the game with 107 yards on ten carries. Blaine Shore rounded out the Gaels scoring with two field goals in the fourth quarter, the latter coming from the 47. Three for four kicking field goals, and six converts seem to indicate that the Gaels kicking game is back on track.

After the game, Ross Francis voiced the feeling that was in the air in the dressing room, "I think everybody's ready for McGill now." After two tune-up games "which allowed us to try a lot of our offense", according to Rutka, the Gaels face their toughest competition of the season when they meet McGill this Saturday in Montreal. Last week McGill defeated Concordia 53-0, so The Gaels and The Redmen seem to be evenly matched. The outcome of next week's game should decide first place in the conference and the Gaels are looking forward to the support of the Queen's fans who are planning to make the trip to Montreal.

Promising runners top the field at RMC

by Ian Gale

The strength of the Gael's cross country team was very evident on Saturday, as the Queen's athletes, sporting their distinctive Union Jack shorts, swept the top six places at the RMC Invitational Meet. Leading the way was captain Adam Shoemaker who finished the hilly five mile course in 27:46. The brightest spot, however, was the second place finish of Rob Livingston who missed all of last year with tendonitis problems.

Third place was claimed by Claus Rinne, just returning to competition after tearing ligaments in his ankle. Close behind them was a battle for fourth position with Mike (Horse) DeGuda nosing out Bob Graham. The two were given identical clockings of 28:25. Rounding out the top six was Sandy Macauley.

In addition to the six university teams present there was a Queen's Alumni team competing. Murray Hale (7th), Bob McCormack (8th), present coach Dave Grant (13th), Max Barr (14th), and former coach Walter Eadie (17th) actually came second in the team competition. Sprinter Vic Gooding and shot putter Kevin Thompson were the other two alumni to conquer the course.

Several rookies made their debut with "Hugh Tafel" being the top finisher, coming in 19th. Two spots back was Colin Funk, followed closely by Lawrence Elliot. Other newcomers running well included Dan DeForge, Duncan MacLachlan, Jean-Paul Spessot, Dan Quance and Chris Paddison.

The women's race pointed out that the defending OWIAA champions won't have to go far to find good competition. What is pleasing to coach Curt Bolton is that this competition is coming from a handful of excellent rookie runners who are pressing the veterans.

Cathy Clark won the 2.5 mile race, while fellow rookies Chrissie Bowlby, Florence McCrimmon, and Vicki Gibbons took the next 3 places, finishing only 3 seconds apart.

This Saturday the men and women travel to the York Invitational meet, with the men seeking a 4th consecutive championship. This race should serve as a better test for both teams.

Former Queen's star Bob McCormack ran for the alumni in the R.M.C. Invitational.

Past champs York and U of T meet defeat

Soccer Gaels rise to top position

by Benny

Among the plethora of events at West Campus on the weekend, were two hotly contested soccer matches

The Queen's Golden Gaels team helped to maintain the university's unblemished record for the weekend by winning both their games.

Saturday's match pitted Queen's against the reigning Canadian University Champions, the York Yeomen. Stressing hard running and short, quick passing, the Gaels carried most of the play in the first half. Austin McGhie put the boys in gold on top with a goal from the penalty spot after 25 minutes of play. Refreshed by the halftime interval, it was York's turn to threaten, but the back four of McGhie, Alan Stewart, Brian Rowe and skipper Brian Sawyers shut down York's strikers with little difficulty. Striker Andy Goodman, playing with renewed desire this year took a McGhie corner and headed it home for the second goal. As the end of the match drew near, Queen's started to dominate play and were unlucky not to have added to their total.

After an 18 hour rest, Queen's returned to action against the U. of T. Blues, perennially league forerunners. Fatigue and the poor condition of the pitch led to rather ragged soccer. The first 45 minutes were scoreless with the fireworks coming in the second half of the match. After half-time, Wally Klus of the Gaels collided with the Blues keeper who went down in a heap. His replacement was met with a McGhie free kick that was too hot to handle and Goodman was there to tuck the rebound away. Twenty minutes from full time the Blues pulled even on a free kick that lodged itself just inside the corner, giving keeper Carl Saunders no chance. Happiness reigned supreme as the combination of McGhie and Goodman pushed Queen's into the lead and a victory.

Coach John Walker commented after the game, "We'll play better and lose, but we've got the 2 points for keeps now." A revised playoff system this year has the top 4 teams meeting to determine a provincial champion. Thus it is likely the Gaels will meet one of these two teams again. For the moment however Queen's finds itself on top of the league, to everyone else's surprise, but not their own.

Ian Gidney

Queen's and U of T players collide midair in Sunday afternoon's game.

Early roll for rowers

by Chris McCormack

In a school in which change take time, a group of conscientious athletes have swung rowing at Queen's into form very well. Queen's now enters its second season of the sport, represented this year by six crews. Both men and women have varsity, junior varsity and novice crews, all slipping into the water at various times of the day, seven days a week.

For many, the average day starts with a two-mile run to the Whig-Standard warehouses, at the mouth of the Cataract, carrying shells down to the water before six a.m. Long before the sun rises!

Most weekends are set aside for regattas. They provide the chance to put training to good use and the opportunity to gain experience for the Ontario University Championships on November 4th.

Last Sunday on the Rideau Canal, the men's varsity crew rowed to a season-opening fourth, faring a little better than the junior varsity crew that ended up struggling with inexperience and a bit of hard luck.

This Saturday, the club heads off to Trent with considerable enthusiasm and optimism. The women's varsity crew is expected to have a really good year and the others should follow suit.

CAREERS IN BUSINESS MANAGEMENT

Back to school. Exams. Christmas. More classes, more exams and graduation. And next...

Right now you are probably thinking about the past several years and what you have to look forward to after graduation.

While you're at it, consider the personal growth and satisfactions you could experience at Procter & Gamble — a leader in the consumer products industry. We regard training and development as our most basic responsibility because we promote strictly from within Procter & Gamble. We know of no way to train people to become managers other than to have them learn by doing.

Economics, history, psychology — our managers include diverse backgrounds. More important than your specific field of study are such basics as intelligence, leadership ability, innovativeness, and a solid track record of achievement.

Prior to on-campus interviews, representatives from Marketing, Finance, and Sales will be visiting your campus to answer questions and talk about their experiences at Procter & Gamble. Specific date, place and time will be advertised soon in this newspaper and at your placement office. The visit will be a one-day informal session in which all interested students can learn more about career opportunities in business management at Procter & Gamble.

As a first step, we invite you to visit your placement office and obtain a copy of our literature. Additional information is also available in the library file in the placement office.

Plan to be at our pre-recruiting session — no appointment necessary, drop in any time.

Take a stand

The time has come for AMS Outer Council to take a firm stand on the myriad of issues presently confronting Queen's students.

Back in February of this year, the Queen's delegation to an OFS plenary session held in Ottawa was the only group to assume a neutral position on support of the mass anti-cutbacks demonstration held at Queen's Park. Outer Council's lack of decisiveness is further indicated by its inability to reach a decision regarding faculty houses at Queen's.

But this Wednesday night Outer Council deals with an issue critical to the future of post-secondary education in Ontario.

A motion is before Council that would support a tuition fee hike if a deterioration of the university system would otherwise result, and provided two conditions are met. The conditions are that the entire increase must be used for universities and shall not in any way diminish the funding which the government makes available for universities, and that a portion of the increased revenue be set aside for grants to students in need.

The motion is clumsy and mis-directed, underlining contentions that a certain lack of direction and purpose exists in Council, particularly on the issue of cutbacks.

The issue of tuition fees is part of the larger cutbacks question. An increase would serve only to shift the burden of financial responsibility to the student while the Ontario government continues on its ill-conceived venture to balance its budget by 1981.

But it is this motion that most clearly epitomizes the indecisiveness of the AMS. Tacit support of tuition hikes despite a number of conditions designed to prevent government re-allocation of funds rightfully belonging to universities should not be considered as a viable policy in dealing with this issue. A direct opposition to tuition hikes must be formulated now. The AMS Executive and Outer Council in general have spent too long without a clear policy on the entire cutbacks question. Now is the time for decisiveness. Hopefully, our student government will finally be willing to take a stand

Tricolour Express delivers

This past weekend the Tricolour Express, an AMS run bus service, transported two full bus loads of students from Kingston to Toronto and back.

It is encouraging to see students so enthusiastically supporting a service run for their benefit. In the Tricolour Express the AMS has created a viable and valuable alternative to regular commercial transportation in Kingston. Taking into consideration the current high cost of both commercial bus and taxi fares, the low price of the AMS bus service belongs to a bygone era. The central location of departure and arrival as well as the economical round trip package reflect a real understanding of student needs.

This service is a vast improvement over similar attempts of the near past. School buses were previously employed with less encouraging passenger response and tales of bus-breakdowns and maniac drivers have become a part of student folklore. This year's service however provides buses whose quality is on a par with those of commercial lines as well as competent and trustworthy drivers.

The organizers have shown initiative in overcoming commercial resistance as well as solid planning in the running of this service. We hope the positive response to the Tricolour Express will continue. Self sufficiency in the Queen's community is a valuable asset as we all begin to feel the pinch of the dollar. Though non-profit in nature the Tricolour Express represents free enterprise at its best. Hats off to the organizers.

Council approves tuition hike

by Rob Southcott

Outer Council voted Wednesday night to accept tuition fee hikes as preferable to a decline in the quality of university education.

Heated debate concentrated on the two long-range goals of accessibility to university for lower income groups and maintenance of quality education in university. A.M.S. External Affairs Commissioner Hugh Dodd, in his introduction of a motion that would accept tuition increases to "maintain the quality of the university system", termed the measure "long range policy for long range good".

The motion, which was amended before debate on it began, read as follows:

"A tuition fee increase would be preferable to a deterioration of the university system. If a tuition fee increase is necessary to maintain the quality of the university system, it would be acceptable only if the entire increase were to be used for universities, and would not in any way diminish the funding which the government makes available for universities. Inherent in an approval of the tuition increases would be the condition that the Ontario Government increase funds available through the student awards program so that those students unable to pay the increase are not prevented from attending university."

Though debate began by simply questioning the relevance of a tuition increase, the emphasis shifted from this to discussion of whether such a motion would be giving a free hand to the Ontario government in their handling of revenues from increased fees.

Speaking for the Queen's Students Against Cutbacks and Unemployment, Colin d'Eca expressed his concern about the effect such a measure would have on the bargaining position of students. He spoke of students who "think that they can go and negotiate with the Ontario government to change the whole funding system."

Continuing, d'Eca presented QSACU's main view; that increased tuition fees would "hinder the accessibility of people from lower income classes to university."

Further discussion revolved around the vulnerability of lower income groups in the event of tuition hikes and the actual trust that should be put in Queen's Park's handling of the increases. AMS president Dave Brown came out clearly against the motion, saying that its timing was "premature" and that he personally believed that it limited accessibility for certain income groups. His opposition was echoed by AMS council member, Lise Doucet, who, unlike Brown, wanted to take an immediate stand, fearing that "the Government's going to push us over as an easy group."

ASUS president Ross Bartlett stated his opposition to the measures. "The Ontario government knows very well what it'll do with the tuition increases," he said.

With its final decision to carry the accept possible tuition increases in the future, the AMS managed to ignore a motion that it passed in 1975 which denounced any tuition increases, but did provide Dave Brown with a fairly firm policy to uphold

New fare structure hurts taxi companies

by Kim Fennell

Cab owners would prefer meters to the present zone-fare system, according to Ken Aalders, part owner of Modern and West-End Taxi.

Aalders says his company has lost business with Queen's students since the Police Commission raised cab fares September 1.

Modern West-End leases the taxi stand at the CNR station, while Amey's handles the Bus depot. Aalders claims more students are taking the Voyageur bus home now because the taxi fare to that depot is about $2.00 cheaper each way.

New zone lines were recently instituted in Kingston, and the cost of each zone line for trips originating or terminating outside the City of Kingston was raised from 25 to 50 cents. With a basic charge of $2.00 and up for just getting into the car on out of town runs, the charge for going from the CNR to Queen's residences is now $5.00 including luggage, up from $2.75. The fare to the Bus depot, on the other hand, remains at $2.00 or $2.50 with luggage.

Modern Taxi did experiments with meters over the summer and found the cost to the train station to be cheaper with the meters than with the zone system. They worked on 80c a mile plus an 80c base charge with a timer of $12.00 per hour. Prices to the train station ranged from $3.30 to $4.40 depending on how heavy the traffic was. Bad weather and slow traffic could make it a $5.00 trip.

Modern/West-End has been working on getting meters instituted for the past 16 months, but Aalders claims the Mayor is blocking progress. The cab owners hired the legal services of Spiel, Viner and Kennedy to help them get the meters. A proposal was put forward to the Public Commission in late May and meters were approved in principle by a 2-1 margin. Police Commissioner Cunningham and Judge Alan Campbell approved the meters while Keyes was opposed. However, since that time, the Commission has refused to give the cab owners an installation date for the meters.

By August, Aalders says, it was obvious that the cab owners were not going to get the meters. He said the owners needed a raise badly so he didn't submit another meter proposal. The Commission then passed new fare increases and added more zones to the township. Aalders says he was told to accept these and not to come around for at least six months.

Aalders describes the new fare system as a "big mess" and claims it's more difficult to work out fares. He

D'Eca resigns QSACU

by John Baktis

As the AMS policies on cutbacks unfolded in a special meeting of Outer Council last Wednesday night the surprise resignation of Colin D'Eca from the QSACU executive and the rumour of QSACU's possible separation from the AMS were announced.

At Wednesday night's meeting the AMS passed the motion to approve tuition fee increases rather than risk deterioration of the level of education at a university level. QSACU, on the other hand, unequivocally opposes any fee increases.

A disgruntled and frustrated D'Eca, liaison officer with QSACU, saw anti-cutback stances of the QSACU dwindle as the AMS supported opposing policies. D'Eca cited this reason for resignation as a conflict of ideologies.

"I can't serve on a committee (QSACU) that is anti-cutback when they (AMS) adopt a policy that adopts cutbacks," he stated. D'Eca is Vice-Chairperson of the Ontario Federation of Students.

In another surprise decision, the QSACU has rumoured its possible separation from the AMS to become a separate committee.

According to Sandi Bar, Chairman of QSACU, "the difficulties that would ensue by us becoming a separate committee are an indication of the severity of the present situation."

An angered Michelle Meyer of the QSACU executive referred to one possible reason for separation.

"It was the conspicuously un-

OFS co-chairperson D'Eca resigned from QSACU to cut his ties with the AMS

derhanded manipulation of the rules to allow the AMS researcher to present a biased and incomprehensible report," she exclaimed.

The affiliation of QSACU with the AMS means AMS policy represents that of the students (including QSACU). "This is totally unacceptable," said a QSACU executive member.

As a separate committee, QSACU would be self-financing, as it would not be recognized by the AMS. Since the OFS only deals with student unions, QSACU would not even be recognized by the Ontario Federation of Students.

Choral group dispute arises

by Liz McClung

Queen's Choral Ensemble director, Denise Narcisse-mair, met Thursday with a Wintario representative to discuss a financial dispute resulting from the group's recent European tour.

Though members of the group were extremely reluctant to comment at this time, the dispute is based upon the Provincial Lottery's withdrawal of sponsorship of the Ensemble in an International Concert, when one of the participating countries withdrew. Apparently, the agreement to support the group was based upon the participation of three or more countries. After arriving from Europe, they found that they were unable to meet this condition.

The outcome of yesterday's meeting will determine whether the Ensemble regains Wintario's support, which would enable them to discharge their financial obligations.

Inhuman penitentiary conditions

by Scott Haig

Conditions inside Canada's maximum security penitentiaries are deplorable, and the inhuman treatment of our convicts is the direct result of a bureaucratic muddle in Ottawa, according to the authors of Cruel and Unusual, Gerry McNeill and Sharon Vance.

Speaking at Monday night's open meeting of the Kingston Civil Liberties Association, McNeill and Vance said they were horrified and disillusioned by what they found while touring Canada's maximum security institutions with the parliamentary subcommittee investigating Canada's prison system.

Despite an increase in government spending from $51 million in 1969, to $200 million in 1978, our prison system remains in a state of barbarous chaos. According to Vance, our reformatories do not reform, our penitentiaries do not produce penitents, and our criminals are not being rehabilitated.

What is especially disappointing is the incredibly low priority the federal government puts on prison reform. There have been well documented problems inside our federal institutions for many decades, yet conditions there, far from being improved by federal authorities, have steadily deteriorated over the years, the parliamentary research assistant said.

"Virtually nothing in the criminal justice system works the way a reasonable person would expect it to," said Miss Vance. "And the only way you're going to change anything in the penitentiary system is by pressure from the outside. The individual citizen has to become involved."

The discussion was enlivened by a stimulating mixture of representatives of concerned disciplines within the audience. Students and instructors in the fields of sociology, psychology, and criminology, the professionals working with inmates and ex-inmates, journalists, and

"veterans" of the system were all in attendance.

The Kingston Civil Liberties Association's next open meeting will take place on Sunday, December 10, the thirtieth anniversary of the United Nations' Declaration of Human Rights.

Cold grey walls conceal human misery

Foreign headaches

by Jane Stirling

The problems facing any new student entering university are often overwhelming but for a foreign student, the difficulties are twice as great, according to Vassilis Rapanos, a foreign student attending Queen's.

Higher tuition fees, lack of research jobs, changing immigration policies and lack of knowledge shown by Canadians about foreigners are problems that must be dealt with, he said.

Rapanos feels he has been discriminated against by the Ontario government. "The Ontario government forbids foreign students from getting research jobs," he stated. A bill is presently before the Ontario legislature which would require all foreign students to return to their own country to be employed in their area of specialty.

Rapanos, claiming he was misinterpreted in a Whig-Standard article recently, said he has "nothing against Queen's but instead against the Ontario government". In fact, Queen's started a fund last year to assist foreign students facing financial difficulties.

Another problem, stricter immigration policies, are causing headaches for foreign students. Any change in degree program now requires verification from the Immigration Office and a renewal of visa.

The problem of communication between foreign students and Canadians is not due to apathy but rather to "a different way of approaching problems and a lack of information about foreign countries," Rapanos said.

Although he said he was "grateful to the university for helping foreign students," he was pessimistic about the future of foreigners in Ontario universities. "Foreign students will eventually be turned off thanks to the Ontario government and the universities won't be able to do a thing about it," he added.

Transition program continues

Minister wants time

Ontario universities will continue to be funded in 1979-80 for approved preliminary and transitional year programs and programs which permit entry from grade 12.

Funding for these programs was to be stopped in 1978-79. However, the Honourable Bette STEPHENSON M.D., who was appointed Minister of Education and Minister of Colleges and Universities on August 18, wants more time to review the issue. "I want to study the matter in depth before making a final decision," Dr. Stephenson said. Dr. Stephenson has also postponed action on proposals affecting the transition of students from the secondary to the post-secondary system.

Among the proposals is one calling for the creation of eight subject councils, made up of educators from the secondary (high school) and post-secondary (college and university) levels. The main purpose of the councils would be to review curriculum in the final years of secondary school and in the early years of university and college, in order to improve co-ordination between the secondary and post-secondary levels of education.

Curriculum areas represented by the councils would be English, french, mathematics, sciences, business and technology, arts, modern and classical languages, and social sciences.

Another proposal suggests standardized grade 3 achievement tests in mathematics and English (or french), depending on first language. The language tests would be written by all grade 13 students, while appropriate sections of the mathematics test would be given to students enrolled in one or more grade 13 math courses.

The tests would not be used as a basis for awarding grade 13 diplomas. Their main purpose would be to give universities more guidance in selecting appropriate courses in first-year university and college programs.

Other proposals include suggestions that:

- universities and colleges be given funds to develop post-admission placement and diagnostic tests;
- numeric and alphabetic equivalencies be established for marks given in courses in secondary schools, colleges and universities;
- while it is appropriate for universities to specify certain grade 13 subjects as necessary for university admission, the universities should not require specific courses at the grade 12 or lower levels.

The working paper is a preliminary response to some of the major issues raised in a long range review which began in 1975 when four major research studies were commissioned by the two Ministries.

Child care talks begin

Staff

An opportunity for women to discuss child care alternatives has been provided by the Ban Righ Centre for Continuing Education.

A three-hour session starting at 11:30 a.m. on Wednesday, October 4 at 32 Queen's Crescent, Queen's University, will provide women with a light lunch, and beginning at 12:00, brief presentations will be made by people involved in the area of child care, including distribution of a list of facilities currently available.

Women with mutual needs are invited to take the opportunity to discuss their problems with a view to resolving cooperative arrangements.

The Centre would be available as a meeting place for follow-up discussion by interested participants.

Enquiries about the session should be made to Janet Troughton or Helen Mathers at the Ban Righ Centre (547-2977). Children can be accommodated for a small charge if advance notice is given. Interested persons should notify Janet Troughton if you plan to attend.

Student special status before law must end

The Editor

In the past, the City has extended greater goodwill towards the university and the university administration, greater scope for responsible action towards its students, than the events of this latest orientation week - especially the events of last Wednesday night - warrant for the future.

The special agreement between the AMS and the city police whereby the AMS has in the past been granted the privilege of prior restraint where complaints have been made concerning its own activities, must end.

It must end because under this agreement, citizens' complaints made first to the police dept. were politely referred to the AMS Orientation Committee. The AMS considered, in what one university administrator called its "innocence", that an answering service was adequate to serve the public interest after normal office hours - the very time when cause for complaint is likely to be greatest. Having received complaints a week ago Wednesday evening within a quarter hour of the beginning of the outdoor concert, the AMS was either unwilling or unable to act. Their default delayed effective action on the part of the city police and eventually produced a situation which - by their own admission - the police had not the manpower to control.

The special agreement must end because both the student organizers and the university administrators have been seen to act irresponsibly towards the larger interests of the Kingston public - those kill-joys who pay the taxes which support this "private" institution, as well as the students who attend it - those dead-beats who face the prospect of paying higher taxes to support the kind of police force necessary to contain the near-riot situation which occurred on University Ave. Thursday, Sept. 14 after the 'musicians' from the outdoor concert had drawn their audiences with inordinate volumes of noise, and then cast them back, footloose, onto the streets of Kingston after midnight.

And finally, it must end because the students who have in the past been the 'benefactors' of such an agreement, mistake privilege for licence, and when abuse brings abrogation, as it did the following night, have the unmitigated gall to cry foul.

In future, students ought to be treated as any other citizen before the law. Every damn one of them found carrying an open beer bottle on a public street ought to be charged.

M.C. Linny

Freedman returns

The Editor

Those of you who read the Queen's Journal last year may recall a few articles which appeared with my name under them and are currently thinking, oh no, not him again! Well, yes, Queen's University succeeded in getting rid of me but the Journal did not. Fortunately I am being deported to a country where a number of exciting events will be occurring over the next few months. Israel, and I will be reporting from there.

Sadat and Begin have surprised us all once again with the Camp David Accords and the possibility of a bilateral peace treaty. It remains to be seen what will transpire concerning the Sinai settlements (but) I hope to be able to report from amidst the celebrations when the whole mess is cleared up.

I'll be arriving in Israel in October but may have the occasional comment before then. After that, communications depend upon the whims of the Israeli and Canadian postal services, but I hope to be contributing regularly in spite of these seemingly insurmountable odds.

Police perspective

The Editor:

It would appear some apprehension exists among the student body regarding the policy of the Kingston Police Force, especially during "Frosh Week".

For many years, police have exercised a degree of tolerance and discretion towards students attending university and other colleges in the city.

The force has monitored activities by the students and responded to complaints from citizens in relation to noise, broken glass on public streets, etc.

A number of such complaints were received on Thursday, September 14th. Physical surveillance, conducted in an area near Queen's campus during late afternoon, indicated the situation could get out of hand during the night, and it was decided further action was necessary in relation to violation of the provincial statutes.

Over the years, this police force has enjoyed excellent co-operation from the faculty, student body and the Alma Mater Society. There has been no change in the policy of the Kingston Police Force as it relates to the student body, however, I feel the action taken on Thursday, September 14th, was necessary, and I hope it was an isolated incident.

I hope the good relationship and liaison between the members of the force and the faculty, student body and the A.M.S. will continue.

Photog alleges wrongdoing by Tricolour

The Editor:

Soon Tricolour '78 will be released to the Queen's Community. The publication is, at the very least, colourful, and contains many spectacular photographs. However, in several cases, Tricolour '78 used photographs without crediting the photographers. For example, several pictures from Golden Words' files were used, but nowhere in the book does the name of any Golden Words photographer appear. Even an incorrect acknowledgement is better than no acknowledgement at all!

In Canada, photographers own the copyright on their own photographs, and it is illegal to publish such material without proper acknowledgement. Photographers can be very touchy about credits. In future, Tricolour should be more careful in such matters.

Commerce house called divisive

The Editor:

I note from the Journal (Friday, 22 September) that the A.M.S. has delayed the opening of a Commerce faculty house. One hopes that the A.M.S. will now have the sense to stop the proposal permanently.

Mr. Court, the Commerce Society President, may feel that this issue has been blown out of proportion. I beg to differ. The matter is not one for Commerce alone to decide on, for it has University-wide implications which go beyond the question of financial liability.

Facts clarified

The Editor:

Whoever did the research for the Harmonium articles had better look for new sources. For the second time you have reported facts that are blatantly wrong. First of all, Richard Seguin never played with the group "Beau Dommage"—he was a part of the group "Les Also Sequins", a family of musicians. At the beginning of the article the author claimed that the show was Harmonium's first engagement in over a year. I find that odd, seeing as I saw them perform in Montreal three weeks ago. I just thought I'd clear that up for you.

Taiwan a pawn in Pacific power play

by Paul D. Tinari

The most important thing which must be considered in undertaking any analysis of the role of Taiwan in the balance of power in the Western Pacific is its strategic position along the coast of Red China. This fact could be of great importance to the Russians, because the island of Taiwan would provide an excellent naval base for their 750 warships now deployed in the Pacific. Russian control over Taiwan would mean that Moscow could exert a great amount of influence on the activities of the mineral rich, and industrial countries of the western Pacific region, such as Malaysia and Japan. Furthermore, the presence of Russian troops in Taiwan would greatly help the progress of "encirclement" policy which Moscow has been pursuing against China.

The reason why Taiwan has been pushed to the forefront of world politics in the last few weeks is due to the warming relations between the U.S. and Mainland China. Taiwan has made it very clear that any treaty of friendship between the Americans and Chinese would place their existing relationship with the U.S. in serious jeopardy. It is possible that Russia would be the first major power to take advantage of such a development and move in to fill the power vacuum. This is the principle reason why Japan has always been strongly against a Sino-US defence

Meanwhile, as the rift between China and Moscow grows ever deeper, one cannot help but wonder about how bad the confrontation will be when it does take place. The countries of the E.E.C. have begun to make ever increasing numbers of friendly gestures to Red China for the simple reason that a strong China will be certain to pin up ever increasing number of Soviet troops in the Far East, thereby relieving some of the pressure on N.A.T.O. forces in Western Europe. Russia herself realizes this situation and has done everything possible to stop it. A case in point is the Russian opposition to the progress being made towards the signing of a peace treaty between Mainland China and Japan.

The only conclusion which can be reached at this time is that the US must plan its upcoming moves very carefully. Taiwan has been a devoted friend and ally to the US for many years, and one should think twice before turning against an old friend. The re-establishment of normal relations with mainland China can be conducted without the formation of a rift with Taiwan. Indeed, the creation of such a rift would be a disaster to the US and the rest of the Western world in economic, political and military terms.

Student activism gets results

Britain cuts back too

by Jayson Myers

Tuition fee increases. Differential fees for foreign students. Provincial expenditure cuts in education. University cutbacks. Students at Queen's, and indeed at universities across Ontario, have become familiar with the "University Policy of the Late-Seventies". We have all been directly affected as our tuition fees have increased. Foreign student fees are now double what they were two years ago. As the readiness of the provincial government to assume growing union education costs decreases, we have felt that pinch of cutbacks over a wide range of university services. If trends continue, future "fiscal restraint" promises additional financial burdens for students, and further cutbacks in services and personnel. That is, costlier, lower quality education.

What do these developments really mean? Quite simply, many Canadian and foreign students are increasingly unable to afford a university education in this province. Yet, most students of a university such as Queen's, do not notice the absence of those who could not finance their education here, and the overwhelming attitude is one of indifference.

Last year I attended the London School of Economics, and I found roles suddenly reversed. I was a foreign (colonial) student paying a tuition fee about 100 per cent more than that of British students. I was also faced with a proposal that fees should be differentiated on an even wider scale. A figure between 1,000 and 1,500 pounds had been estimated as a possible "levelling off" target for tuition paid by foreign students whereas domestic students currently pay about 527 pounds. The prospect was not appealing.

Britain continues to face grave economic problems, and the British government, like the Ontario government, has resorted to decreasing its expenditure on such services as university education. In fact, the effects of financial cutbacks might be magnified in Britain where over the past four years, tuition for British students has risen from approximately 140 pounds to a figure of 527 pounds. (It was only 70 pounds in 1968 and 50 pounds in 1962). It is true that in many cases fees are paid by local education authorities, but mature self-financing, and foreign students must fend for themselves. (The effect of foreign fee differentials is extreme in Britain, due to their relatively large numbers up to as high as 90% in some technical colleges). This calls the principle of university enrolment according to academic qualifications into further question, increasingly emphasizing financial prerequisites instead.

The British situation has certainly led to an appraisal of Westminster's attitude respecting the merits and the priorities of the public funding of education at the university level.

Criticism of the government's general deflationary measures remains widespread. The response of students ranged from letters of protest to direct radical protest action against Government ministers. LSE student union meetings throughout the year vociferously criticized and protested fee increases and cutbacks. The school instituted a Hardship Fund to provide an essential, however small, level of financial assistance for foreign students. Petitions were regularly sent to Westminster. An occupation was launched against the school administration. (This has become somewhat of an annual event at the L.S.E.) A myriad of other groups such as the Canadian University Society also actively protested. The National Union of Students picketed Westminster and protested (a bit too loudly) in Parliament itself. Consequently proposals for the institution of tuition fee increases, additional differentialization, and cutbacks have in several cases been reduced or even shelved. The active, concerned and informed responses against government restraint policy has indeed been effective!

The British experience points to the necessity of student involvement in the governmental decision-making process as it affects university education here at Queen's. If we claim to be responsible for the provision of education, and we maintain that university education is something of real value to society, then are we not committed to providing the best services to students selected purely on the basis

by Colin Brown

Perhaps the most frightening thought arising from Monday's air disaster in San Diego is that it can happen anywhere. Mid-air collisions have occurred over New York City on Christmas Eve, on a foggy runway in the Canary Islands and even on a sunny summer day in Kingston. Though each case is different, there is one tragic and glaring common factor: lack of communication. Somehow people neglected to be quite as alert as they should and one small error snowballed into a catastrophe.

Yet, it is not human error in the truest sense. Air traffic controllers and professional pilots are possibly the most competent, alert, and dedicated people trained for any job anywhere. Whatever error they may commit must not be blamed on them, but the system which serves them.

There lies the human error, for it is humans who have created the air traffic control system that these men and women must put their faith in. In Canada and the United States the system needs improvement. For the busiest airport areas in the U.S., which are admittedly far more frantic in character than Canada's, all aircraft must be equipped with on-board collision avoidance devices. In Canada, our busy airports simply must be brought up to a reasonable safety standard by installing airport radar facilities. Presently, there are only ten radar-equipped airports in Canada. The London airport has a 10% increase of traffic volume each year, handles more traffic than Mirabel and Dorval combined in some months and yet is on the "waiting list" of Transport Canada's renovation program. Meanwhile pilots of commercial and corporate jets, light and training aircraft put their faith in a man in a tower who can separate them by visual contact only. It's frightening, as are the horror stories of "near-misses" from pilots and controllers.

It's time our governments pulled out the stops and gave us the safest air traffic control money can buy, a viable system which doesn't tax the abilities of those it serves. And don't tell us you can't afford it, we all stopped believing that sort of double-talk a long time ago.

of their academic qualifications? Perhaps more than anything else, the British experience shows, in a fairly emphatic way, that university students must be aware of what is happening to university services, that they must appreciate the implications of provincial policy in this respect, and that they must act upon these considerations.

John Deutsch University Centre:- new hopes laid on old foundations

past

By Tim Greenwood

The piece of land on which our University Centre now stands was originally occupied by an orphanage, a haven for Kingston's unfortunate waifs and not its students. In 1927, however, Queen's bought the property and the building from the Orphan's Home and Widow's Friend Society, and in 1929, after alterations, the original Student Memorial Union was opened.

These and other interesting facts about the background and history of the John Deutsch University Centre were recounted to me by its director Norm Hart in a short interview last Tuesday.

The idea for a student union grew out of an inquiry into a "fitting memorial" to the 189 Queen's men who had given their lives during the first World War. Over half of the students at this time were veterans and the majority supported the idea of a student union which would honour the dead and be of service to the living.

"The original union was designed as an exclusive men's club along the lines of U of T's Hart House, and women weren't allowed in," Hart reflected. However in 1947 a fire which caused considerable damage changed this. In the restored and improved union, which reopened in the fall of 1948, women were allowed into buildings for meals, but they were required to use the back entrance.

In 1947 a fire struck the Student Memorial Building. Students clambering in windows managed to save valuable old back issues of the Journal

Besides being the central dining area for the campus, "it was probably the only place providing culture and entertainment on campus at that time", Hart observed. In those early years the Union housed the student government, the Journal office, the Padre's office, and a few other offices, the start of student services", as Hart described it.

The Union had been expanded after the fire, but at that time the Queen's population was about 3,000. When the population climbed toward 10,000 in the '70's the need for expansion became obvious and extensive planning was begun.

However, before the expansion had moved past the planning stage, the Ontario budget constraints hit and Queen's consequently missed government funding. Guelph University was working on its own centre at the time, but they had gone as far as excavation, and Hart reflected that they were able to point "to the hole that had already been dug and were able to obtain government money."

"I somehow think it's just as well we missed the funding," said Hart. He felt that raising our own capital has given us an emotional lift as well as a few financial advantages. The fact that we missed the government funding gives us more persuasive power in asking for contributions for projects like Queen's Quest, as well as making us eligible for Wintario funding of cultural and recreational projects", he explained.

The reasons for naming the centre after John Deutsch (who unfortunately died in the late spring of '76, before the project was completed) were twofold, Hart said.

Principal Deutsch showed foresight in the early sixties in appointing students to committees at Queen's to avoid the confrontations and unrest which was evident on the campuses of Berkeley and U of T at the time. Deutsch's policy was probably largely responsible for the relative calm of the Queen's campus during the turbulent sixties Hart reflected. "Now students have a place in just about every committee at Queen's" Hart said.

The second motivation behind the name selection was in appreciation of Deutsch's instrumental role in encouraging the Board of Trustees to raise the funds for the expansion of the Centre.

present

By Tim Greenwood

The John Deutsch University Centre today operates with most of the same guiding principles as its predecessors. "It is still a place where student, staff, and faculty can meet together in an atmosphere of free exchange", University Centre building manager Norm Hart said. "However, the present Centre has a new philosophy emphasizing the need for appealing to the entire university community, the 13,000-odd people that populate the campus."

Within its walls, the Centre houses a number of student-run organizations, which are open to all students. Beyond the established groups like the AMS and Tricolour, there is room for expansion as the AMS has several rooms set aside for deserving clubs. Interested clubs should take their cause to AMS Vice President (Operations) John Koopman, and try to convince him of their worthiness, Hart said.

The International Centre, which can be found behind a set of glass doors down the hallway past the Quiet Pub, is encouraging more participation by Canadian students this year. Wende Werthman, (senior secretary of the International Centre), said it is a common misunderstanding that the Centre is just for foreign students, a myth she recently heard propagated by a Gaelic friend Frosh around. Six ethnic clubs with membership open to students of any nationality have their base in the International Centre, and there is also the International Club. This year, the Centre will be sponsoring foreign film nights, an international cooking school, as well as a Mini-Folklore Festival. The informal setting of the afternoon tea, which is served every weekday at 3:00 in the International Centre lounge, is an excellent time to just drop in and learn more about the Centre.

The central meeting area is known as Ceilidh (Kalee), Gaelic for "exchange of ideas". A Gaelic professor led Norm Hart to reconsider his first idea which translated "thicket of wild dogs".

Somewhere to get away from it all.

From this Council is drawn the Program Committee, which is responsible for developing an educational and entertaining year of programming, through the allocation of a $10,000 budget. The lunch-time concerts which will take place in the central meeting area upstairs are an example of the Committee's programming.

Rooms may be booked from the University Centre office for meetings and they are free of charge except when setup is required. A room like the Skylight Dining Room may be reserved and the charge would be $35, the actual cost for setting up. The Quiet Pub may also be booked during off license hours through Norm Hart, or during licensed hours through Doug Wilkie, the Pub's Manager. With the high demand for rooms, it is a good idea to book rooms up to two weeks in advance.

The Centre offers such commercial operations as a bank, a bookstore, a hairstyling salon, as well as a Tuck shop. "Ye Olde Tuck Shoppe" is run by veterans Ann Gordon and Minerva Lavalley. Some students may remember Ms. Gordon as Applie Annes, so named when she sold apples in the old tuck shop.

The commercial enterprises within the Centre pay their lease and pay royalties directly to the Centre. This money goes toward defraying the cost of the Centre's operation, Hart said.

The House of Commons is the games room of the Centre and besides housing the pool tables, it has been recently stocked with a number of electronic games. Hart said that the old pool hall style of room was avoided in order that it might attract women.

For the hungry and for those who like to dine out, there is the sidewalk cafe, the Skylight Dining Room, as well as the Oak Room. The Skylight Dining room is now licensed so that diners can now sip wine as they sup.

Besides appealing to the university community the Centre also serves as a resource centre for the whole of Kingston. "It is one way we can put the university on display to the Community," Hart said. "Programming of this is primarily done when the university is not in session," he added. Eco-Fair, a convention of the handicapped, and a meeting of Young Calvinists all made use of the University Centre this past spring and summer.

With ramps leading in from the University entrance, as well as an elevator and special washroom facilities the Centre is very accessible for the handicapped. Once a month there is a religious meeting of handicapped people, Hart said.

This December when Kingston hosts the Ontario Winter Games, the University Centre will become a reception and recreation area for the athletes.

"The level of activity here as compared to where we began is phenomenal," Hart said. "We have a standing joke around the office that if it involves less than 2,000 people we don't get excited about it," Hart said with a chuckle. "We're very pleased with the extent to which students faculty and staff are using the Centre."

future

The Difference...

We at Dimension Stereo pre-select the best values in stereo equipment and then put together well balanced combinations for maximum system performance. Our $685 system is a good example. The speaker system is so important that we have selected the new Advent 1. It uses the same woofer and tweeter as the famous large Advent but in a smaller enclosure. It sounds very similar but bass output at ultra-low frequencies is slightly less. Its great sound has made it a best seller over night.

The receiver is a remarkable achievement by SONY. The model STR-V2 produces 25 watts per channel at a price where others produce 15. We feel that this is the outstanding buy of the season.

We have added the popular TAYA CP250 auto-shut-off turntable for its high performance, attractive appearance and moderate cost.

At only $685, this system provides a big, room-filling sound that is warm and clear.

In addition, our approach to customer support is unique. Our staff are trained in both technical and sales areas—our service people are sales people. Our $25,000 test lab is used to check and adjust every unit sold so that it works better when it leaves our store. We provide real 5 year warranties and repairs are done on our premises by our staff under our control. So service is effective, and fast.

... it makes the difference.

Bodygraphics explore new theatre alternatives

by Julian Cunningham

You have arrived late at the timeless grey limestone structure. You ring the doorbell. A young gentleman quietly ushers you through the glass and steel frame door, introduces himself, and points the way up a narrow wooden staircase.

The steep ascent finished, you are suddenly in an enormous L-shaped room haphazardly dotted with furniture.

The young man introduces you to his colleague who offers you a glass of cider, "non-alcoholic of course," and you quietly melt into the chair provided for you.

The room loses its hostility and anarchy. There is a definite purpose to it now.

The huge support beams fan out from the apex of the ceiling, dominating each defined space below: in one corner, what appears to be an Oriental dinner setting—a low table surrounded by pillows; a ladder leading nowhere; a large ramp adjoined to a platform, and of course the conventional living room setting from which you silently observe.

all this under the liquid voice of Tim Curry and the soundtrack from The Rocky Horror Picture Show.

This is the home of "The Alternative Theatre Workshop," and of its co-creators, Peter Ayton and Raymond Cosgrove, who are offering Kingstonians a thoroughly unconventional theatre opportunity.

The pair met a year and a half ago in Toronto. Peter was a dance student and part-time model. Under his teacher, Pavlychuk, he was developing what he calls "the minimum muscular tension technique of movement."

With regard to dance, this method seeks to eliminate one's "personal ups," thus removing the obtrusive personality of the dancer from his performance, and eventually supplanting the prima donna phenomenon with a kind of "egoless dance."

Raymond Cosgrove was becoming disillusioned with theatre in Toronto. As an actor, conventional productions no longer satisfied him.

The pair incorporated their particular skills, attempting in effect to unify dance and acting in performance, to make the two as one. In their terminology, "Bodygraphics."

Unspecified circumstances led them to the remarkable studio at the bottom of Princess St (once occupied by the Domino Theatre), which they call their workshop and home.

With a personal loan of $3,000 they took the blank canvas, the living shell of their dream, and painted their unique impressions on the room to create the unusual studio.

They are presently broke.

Why Kingston?

"Kingston is fresh, no runover," explains Raymond as he sips his cider.

"There are extraordinarily nice people in Kingston."

Indeed, as it turns out, all the furniture in the studio has been donated by local people.

The conservative quality of life so deep-rooted in Kingston, doesn't seem to bother Raymond, who claims that by mere word of mouth, an overwhelming number of "Alternative People" have shown up at the studio, including members of Theatre 5, Kingston's resident professional company.

Raymond and Peter are running workshops Tuesday-Thursday at 10:30 am., and on Tuesday and Wednesday nights at 7:00 pm. Due to favourable response, they may add a Friday night workshop.

Saturday night marks their weekly "performance." They are careful to explain that they do not want people to get the impression that "at 8:30 the curtain goes up."

The evening begins with an informal gathering in a party atmosphere around 9:00. Then—usually around midnight—the duo will get up and perform.

The type of "performance" rendered is defined by their mood on any particular night, and they will welcome anyone in the community who would like to contribute to the "performance." They have already been approached by a congo drummer from Queen's who is eager to accompany them.

"Success" to these two means being able to live and work in Kingston for at least one year. Yet despite their financial doldrum, they refuse formally to publicize either the "dance theatre" workshops or the "performances."

Inseparable from their "alternative concept," is their desire as artists "to garner a response in the community" without the use of hard-sell techniques, an admirable quality in an age of pabulum theatre and suppressed idealism.

As quickly as it began, the interview—the interlude—is over. It is time to leave, but not before you try one last time, to absorb the spectacle of this unique L-shaped fortress which has held you a willing hostage this past hour.

You quietly thank your hosts, then walk past a curious latticed wood structure towards the arch leading down the narrow staircase.

The sign over the arch reads "EXEUNT." A reflection on Peter Brook's Empty Space, and a notion that perhaps you have just performed in it, are squelched by the familiar din of street noise, as the glass and steel frame door closes quietly behind you.

Cosgrove and Ayton bring personalized theatre to Kingston audiences.

Starker simmers, then boils

by Fiona Grieve

An evening of music pairing our Musicians-in-Residence and Jano Starker, a cellist of note, was an exciting prospect. Yet, I reflected at intermission, the music was not living up to expectations—something held back our soloist, he was frustrated in his search for a close rapport with the audience. Suddenly, starting a very challenging work, his tenseness disappeared as he amazed the audience with musical mastery, emanating confidence and strength. This is what the audience came for and they did not go home disappointed.

In the first half there were beautiful moments, but as a whole I felt unsatisfied, in every piece there was some small detail jarring the overall effect.

Some movements in Pieces en Concert for cello and strings were not quite synchronized properly so the beautiful feeling of musical union of instruments was not quite achieved. The balance caused problems also. Starker was, at times, overshadowed by the quartet, particularly where the viola and cello accompanied him.

The Solo Sonata by Hindemith which followed is a rather intellectual work. Starker certainly made a lot out of it, the strong passages of the Langsam and the display of technique in Maessig schnell were impressive. However, never in this piece did Starker play with the full depth of tone he is credited with.

The three movements from the Bach suite in C major rounded off the programme's first half. The Bourée, taken at a fast pace, was the most lively and dramatic of these. Even here, although Starker displayed technical excellence and made beautiful contrasts, his sound in louder passages was hampered by stray harmonics.

Yet, why did we all come away so impressed? From the first note of the Kodaly sonata, Starker simply entranced the audience. All the tensions, all the discordant details were gone in this breathtaking display of just about every technique and sound possible on the cello.

The standing ovation the audience awarded this performance was liberally supplemented with bravos. Starker responded with a beautifully simple and controlled encore which held the audience intently making a memorable finale.

Gilmour's album: Shades of Pink

by Paul Seay

In the early summer of this year, David Gilmour (lead guitarist for Pink Floyd) put out his first solo album called David Gilmour. For those that were disappointed that Pink Floyd didn't put out an album this year, here is your substitute.

Although this new album by a member of Pink Floyd has cast some doubt about the future of the band, it certainly fills the void left by the absence of a new Pink Floyd release. Produced by Gilmour himself, the album has Rick Wills on bass, and Willie Wilson on drums. From the appearance of the inner cover of the album, it seems as though these three artists have played together before. Nevertheless, Wilson certainly captures the powerful drumming style of Nick Mason (Gilmour's regular drummer with Pink Floyd), and with the background vocals of Rick Wills matching those of Roger Waters, the album takes on a similar sound to any recently released Pink Floyd albums.

The album opens with an instrumental piece entitled "Mihalis". This cut reflects the typical opening of a Pink Floyd album by having a "laid back" approach to the music, emphasizing Gilmour's unique style of guitar. From this, Gilmour moves into a vocal cut entitled "There's No Way Out Of Here" dealing with a particular theme that runs throughout the entire album. Again, as typical of Pink Floyd albums, this theme tends to be slightly pessimistic, dealing primarily with the topic of work and the rut one can get into while doing any job, whether school or real work. After introducing this theme, Gilmour moves on to more mellow music as if to tell the listener to think about what is meant by the second song.

Pursuing the theme that was established on the first side, Gilmour begins the second by asking what the "quality of life" has become, and then continues to ponder that question in the first cut of side two.

From this he moves on to another instrumental piece, again showing his proficiency in slide guitar, by this time an obvious element to the entire album. By the third song, Gilmour has resorted to another Pink Floyd trick of answering to the previous songs about life... but from the listeners point of view in other words, he is giving an argument a chance on this album. Naturally, this third song being of a more optimistic view, the fourth has to be another instrumental reflecting this new found optimism in the likes of some enthusiastic slide guitar from Gilmour, backed by the excitement of Wills and Wilson on bass and drums respectively.

The album ends on an optimistic level by directing the lyrics - at the listener once again. This last song sums up the argument by voicing the opinion of the listener (after hearing the entire album) yet adding a few more points in the lies of "It's a new one to me to even dream that you're free..." Considering what Gilmour is trying to say on his album, it is easy to understand lyrics like "my direction is lost" in the last song. For Pink Floyd fans, this album is a must. For music lovers, this album is well worth its price.

Sackbut inventor honored

The internationally distinguished pioneer of Electronic Music, Dr. Hugh Le Caine will be the focus of a concert of electronic music to be given in Harrison-Le Caine Hall, on Friday, 29 September 1978 in Room 120. Dr. Le Caine, whose death in July 1977 was a very considerable loss to music in Canada, as well as in the field of electronic music, was born in Ontario in 1914. He received his B.Sc. and M.Sc. from Queen's and a Ph.D. from the University of Birmingham. While making significant contributions to the field of radar during his long association with the National Research Council, he also directed research in the development of electronic musical instruments. His work as a pioneer in this field dates back to 1945 when he developed the Sackbut - a synthesizer that anticipated the "first" synthesizer of Robert A. Moog by some nineteen years. In addition, he was instrumental in establishing the University of Toronto's Electronic Music Studio (the second in North America) in 1959, the Hebrew University Studio in Jerusalem (1961) and the McGill Electronic Music Studio (1964). Although Dr. Le Caine did not think of himself as a composer, he produced eleven short electronic works of both integrity and charm. His works have been included in many concerts and broadcasts of electronic music as well as being utilized for film. His composition "Invocation" was used for title music for the CBC-TV series, "The Disordered Mind".

As a tribute to the memory of this distinguished man, the Music Department at Queen's has assembled a program of electronic music to be heard in Friday's concert of electronic works by composers who worked with Dr. Le Caine and his electronic devices. The program not only illustrates the remarkable technical possibilities of Dr. Le Caine's inventions but also illustrates the associated aesthetic developments in electronic music, to which he also made a contribution, over the period from 1955 to the present.

On the program are compositions by Hugh Le Caine; the late Myron Schaeffer, who established the University of Toronto's Electronic Music Studio in co-operation with Dr. Le Caine; Istvan Anhalt, Head of the Music Department at Queen's who set up the Electronic Music Studio; Gustav Ciamaga, founder and Director of the Electronic Music Studio at Brandeis University and now Dean of the Faculty of Music at the University of Toronto; Dr. Paul Pedersen who was originally Director of the Studio at McGill and now Dean of the McGill Faculty of Music; and Barry Truax, a graduate of Queen's who is currently teaching in the Department of Communication Studies at Simon Fraser University and is also Director of Research for the World Soundscape Project.

Most of the composers of the works on the program will be present at this concert: their tribute in person to the late Dr. Hugh Le Caine.

Rugby Gaels remain undefeated

by Don Cameron

Last Saturday, under clear skies with a capacity crowd cheering them on, the Rugby Gaels edged the Warriors 16-12 in what may have been one of the biggest games of their season. The Gaels, now 2-0, seem well on their way to the coveted Inter-collegiate Rugby Championship.

The first match was a hard fought physical game with the lead seeing-sawing between the two teams. At half time the score was tied at 6-6 with the Gaels splitting the upright on two kicks by Costeloe. The Warriors were also good on two kicks. Only minutes into the second half, the Gaels scored on an electrifying run by Costeloe. Calypso Costeloe delighted the fans with his dancing ability as he weaved his way through half the Waterloo team on his way to four points. Williams, showing his dependability as a kicker, made the conversion to give Queen's a 12-6 lead over the Warriors.

The Gaels, perhaps a bit over-confident, were called for two penalties which Waterloo made good on to tie the game up at 12-12. Inspired by their come-back, the Warriors pressed heavily containing the Gaels within their own 20 meter line. Playing strong defensive rugby the Gaels managed to hold off the Warriors and turned the game around, putting Waterloo on the defensive. With seconds left in the game Rob Bruce took the ball from a loose ruck and rammed around the end to score the winning try. The score at the whistle was 16-12, the Gaels had won the big one.

The seconds played a wide open game against the Warriors, last year's champions, shutting them out 22-0. Kevin Wilson ran strongly, bursting through the Warriors pack for two tries. Peter McQuig, Alastair Hard practices such as these paid off during the past weekend as the Rugby Gaels fought their way to a crucial victory over Waterloo.

Mathers and Dennis Johnson all collected singles. The win on Saturday leaves the seconds with a 2-0 record, the best in the league.

The Kingston Area Selects played the Quebec Provincial Team on Sunday. Players chosen from the Queen's team were Gray, Payne, Price, Cameron, P. Reid, Williams, Bloeman, Loucks, Lemon MacIntosh, and Wilson. Nigel Costeloe, for the second year running, played for the Quebec team.

Although the score was somewhat lopsided in favour of the Quebec side the game was a good learning experience for the Queen's players. Bill Payne, after playing a fine game, was invited to try out for the provincial squad by the Quebec Coach.

This Saturday the Gaels host the R.M.C. Redmen at 12:00 p.m. Redmen, after tying the Guelph University Gryphons, are looking strong, so the game will be a good one. On Sunday the Queen's Rugby Club play the Old Boys at West Campus.

Athletes of the week

As noted in the Journal previously, this column has been established to bring some recognition to the players and teams in the Queen's Inter-collegiate program.

During the past week, teams wearing the Queen's colours were victorious in every competition they entered. Some of the highlights of these games are as follows:

Queen's rugby teams have always been strong and they proved they'll be championship contenders again this year by defeating last year's O.U.A.A. champs - Waterloo 16-12 in a closely contested match. The mobility and cohesion of the Queen's forwards was particularly effective in controlling the ball throughout the game. The forwards for the Queen's 1st 15 include: Rob Bruce, P.P. Bloeman, Del Demonte, Dave Loucks, Dave Bonnet, Don Cameron, Jim Stone and Bill Payne.

The Queen's soccer team began the season with two impressive victories over York 2-0 and University of Toronto 2-1. Queen's superior teamwork proved too much for York, who were last season's Canadian champions. Against University of Toronto, it wasn't until the last minute of play that Queen's scored the go ahead goal. Andy Goodman seemed to be in the right place at the right time for Queen's and counted for 3 of their 4 goals.

At the RMC Invitational cross-country race in which 13 teams took part, Queen's showed their superiority by placing 1-2-3-4-5 and 6th and winning both the team championship and individual championship. Adam Shoemaker captured the 5.6 mile event, 24 seconds ahead of team-mate Rob Livingston. Team veteran Claus Rinne placed third.

by Mark Pentland

It may be fitting that P.H.E. should win the first Bews sports, as they were the Bews champions in 1977-78. However, their win in the tug-of-war did not come easily, as M.B.A. gave P.H.E. a strong fight in their semi-final pull. Meanwhile Civil battled with Mining to emerge victorious and thus enter the final. The final match saw P.H.E. outpull the Civil unit to pick up their first championship of the year.

The Track and Field meet was a huge success largely due to the work done by sticks of the individual units and also to the organizational contribution of the Queen's Track Club. Three records were broken on the track and one in the field events. Bob McCormack (Meds) smashed the existing record of 4:13.8 in the 1500m by 5.4 seconds and also erased the old 800m mark of 2:03.8 by clocking an impressive 1:57.8

Bews rivalries are as fierce as ever again this year, and the Monsterball competition is no exception.

Chris Reid (PHE) took 1.3 seconds off the 400m record, to set the new one at 53.0 seconds. Tim Wardrop, also of P.H.E., established a new record in the pole vault with a jump of 4 metres.

The Bews Relays will be run on Tuesday, Oct. 3 at West Campus, with the first event beginning at 6pm. Both Meds and PHE will battle to see who will win the joint Track and Field and Relays Championship (both are tied after the Track and Field meet). All other units are encouraged to be the "heartbreakers" and to win as many Relay races as possible, in order to foil a championship contender.

Soccer, Football, Softball, Rugby and Innertube Waterpolo begin next Monday, with their schedules continuing through October and November. Members of the Queen's male population who would like to play any of these sports, should notify the stick of their unit via a notice placed in his mailbox in the P.E.C., Intramural/Rec. Office.

Queen's sailors Ontario champs

U.S. competition tougher

by Clayton Jaeger

Although the year at Queen's has just begun, the Queen's sailing team has already participated in numerous regattas.

Last weekend, eight Queen's sailors went down to sunny Annapolis, M.D. to sail in the Navy Fall Invitational. This regatta was one of the largest intercollegiate events of the fall season with 20 universities participating. Needless to say, competition was extremely stiff. Navy won the meet, with SUNY Maritime Academy second. Queen's placed 9th overall.

Among those racing for Queen's were: A Division: Skipper Tony Snell, crew Ken Silver (4th in their division); B Div. Karen Morch, Sandy Struthers, and Jane Hickey; C Div. Steve Fleckenstein; D Div. Martin Tenbove. A and B Divisions were sailed in 420's, C and D in Lasers.

R.M.C. hosted the Ontario Championships last weekend, but the turnout was disappointing. Only 3 schools showed up: Queen's, R.M.C. and Western. Queen's won and RMC came second. Fred Jacques and Danny Grant skipped for Queen's with Jane Curr and Darcy crewing. Ian McClaren and Chris Janice filled in the B division for Western.

Two Queen's students, Terry MacLaughlin and Hugh Kidd represented Canada with their crews in the Flying Dutchman World Championships in England. Hugh came in fourth and Terry took twelfth place out of some fifty participants.

Kingston Yacht Club was also represented by Queen's sailors (past and present) this weekend, in the Curry Cup at the Britannia Yacht Club in Ottawa. Sailing International 14's were Rob Sampson, Dave Balfour, and John Lazier with crews Mark Rutherford, Dave Soferman, and Peter Jones.

They all cooperated to bring the 1st place trophy back to K.Y.C. thwarting four other yacht clubs with a total of twelve boats.

Ed. Note: Technically, Queen's does not have a sailing "team" as this sport is not recognized by the OUAA (Ontario University Athletic Association).

The above group sails as a club, not officially funded by the university although in the past they have received support from individuals and campus groups.

According to Mr. Al Lenard, one of the coordinators of Intercollegiate Athletics for Queen's, when an attempt was made in the early 1970's to found an intercollegiate sailing program not enough universities in Ontario had access to practice water or adequate equipment (expensive enough to rent alone) to provide competition. The Queen's sailors have repeatedly been refused subsidization from the University Council on Athletics, on the grounds that it is an OUAA sport, they are not officially representing Queen's.

Lenard emphasized the fact that although the sailors are keen and skilled, they do not put in practice hours with a coach and training schedule for inexperienced rookies as other Queen's sports do.

In Kingston mixed weather did not prevent a good showing

Soccer - Queen's goes to Guelph on Sat. and play at 3pm.

Tennis - the men host the Eastern Section Sat.

Track and Field - both men and women go to the McMaster Invitational Sat. at 1pm.

Weather in Annapolis was warm with a stiff breeze.

The season totals only a few weeks and unfortunately the bulk of the events take place the following spring after school is out - generally in the U.S. and the Caribbean.

Boneman's byline

For those students who enjoy watching a lively, fast-paced contact sport, there is an alternative to Gaels football. Quite unbeknownst to the majority of drunken Queen's students, the rugged Gaels have put together an impressive record over the last few years.

This year's team is off to a fast start with victories over McMaster, and last season's champs, Waterloo. The 78 edition of Rugby Gaels has a good mixture of talent and experience, and all concerned have high hopes for a successful campaign. The Gaels have an upcoming game on Saturday, against a surprisingly tough RMC squad. A victory in this match would be a big step towards a playoff berth at the end of the season.

For those of you who are tired of being molested at sporting events by yellow-jacketed individuals, or forced to drink unearthly concoctions from insalubrious wineskins, consider taking in this weekend's action at RMC.

Tim Turnbull forsees close match with Redman

Battle of the undefeated

by Tim Turnbull

The day of reckoning for the Queen's Golden Gaels football team will occur this Saturday at Molson Stadium in Montreal. The Gaels meet the McGill Redmen in a battle of undefeated heavyweights in the OQIFC-Eastern division race.

In two games the Gaels have crushed the Trois Rivières Patriotes 46-7 and the Concordia Stingers 52-0, yet both games are considered tune-ups for the McGill clash. Queen's can not be considered as a real contender until the top four teams are faced and defeated. If Trois Rivières or Concordia are able to defeat one of the top five teams, it will only be by an act of God.

Offensively, coach Doug Hargreaves rates the Gaels above the Redmen because of our explosive power both on the ground and through the air. Tom McCartney and Tony Manastersky can run off tackle, while Dave Marinucci's 100 yard game hints that he is ready to run rampant through the middle again. After two games, the linemen are pleased with their performances, but realize that the real season begins Saturday. The McGill defence has only given up six points thus far, so the offence will have to be sharp to prevent turnovers.

The passing game has been very strong, particularly the Jim Rutka to Bob O'Doherty combination. With six touchdowns to his credit, O'Doherty will be closely guarded by the McGill defenders. If O'Doherty draws double coverage, then Rutka can pass to Sheridan, Shugart, Shore or even Marinucci circling out of the backfield. Nevertheless, the bomb to O'Doherty will always be a threat.

The Queen's defence will be under fire this week. Against Carlton, McGill rolled up 300 yards from scrimmage and 400 yards on the specialty teams. If the McGill return men are not contained, then the Redmen will enjoy excellent field position and better scoring opportunities.

I am expecting a tight, relatively low scoring game. With John Vernon and Bruce Balson leading the defence, the team has been approaching this game with a great deal of intensity and pride. This game could be a preview of the playoff final for the championship of the OQIFC-Eastern division. Although Queen's is rated fifth in the country and McGill is ranked eighth, that is irrelevant here. National rankings do not win football games; inspired players do.

Gaels' faithful will be at Molson Stadium in force on Saturday. Golden Words has chartered a bus for the occasion. Don "Doc" Docherty, organizer of the trip, said that thirty-eight people have signed up for the trip. A pep rally will be held in Place Jacques Cartier at 11pm Friday night, led by the cheerleaders and the band. The players may not admit it, but any support at away contests is appreciated, particularly

In the upcoming game with McGill the skills of players like Dave Marinucci will be tested in the Gaels' first real battle of the season.

Council's new policy dangerous

AMS Outer Council has made a decision reflecting a questionable understanding of the issues facing students today. Just two days ago in an emergency meeting Council voted in favour of a tuition fee increase as being "preferable to a deterioration of the university system."

Since it is generally acknowledged that the cutbacks in real dollar funding from the Ontario Government to universities has resulted, and will continue to result, in a decline in the quality of university education, this motion can be re-stated as follows: "A tuition fee increase is preferable to the present state of affairs." Or, more succinctly, "an immediate tuition fee increase is acceptable to us."

The assertion that such a position is in the interests of students is totally misconceived. Low-income students, in the face of record unemployment and a revised student aid program that benefits some and hurts others, can ill afford even the most modest of increases in tuition. Though the motion contains a condition that government adequately provide for this group, few have indicated how they intend to ensure that the government fulfills this condition.

Moreover, Outer Council's new policy does nothing to confront the vital issue of government responsibility in funding post-secondary education. Over the last few years, the Ontario Government has relegated post-secondary education to a lower and lower priority level. In real dollars, funding to universities has substantially decreased. Essentially, our provincial government has abdicated its financial responsibilities in maintaining the quality of our education.

Are we to pick up the slack? Are we to support a trend that de-emphasizes the value of universities to society?

Our Outer Council thinks we should

Last spring, when 7,000 students across the province assembled before the steps of the legislature in the largest student demonstration in Canada's history, this same council voted to remain neutral on the issue.

Last Wednesday, Council did it again. It abandoned the interests of the constituents it was elected to serve. This is a dangerous trend indeed

Conference offers opportunity

Cutbacks is again the theme as the Ontario Federation of Students (OFS) formulates its fall strategy this weekend at Queen's.

The success of student opposition to social service cutbacks depends largely upon the effectiveness of OFS. As the most influential student interest group in Ontario it is important that students are aware of what OFS is doing. This conference provides an opportunity for all Queen's students to become

by Brent Laviolette

A battle between the 1979 official Tricolour photographers and competitor Wallace Berry could result in some students not having their graduation photos published in this year's Tricolour, according to yearbook sources.

If students have their Tricolour photographs taken by a photographer other than either Sparks and Associates or Flair Photographic, the official photographers this year, their picture will not appear in the Tricolour, unless the complete graduating class uses the same photographer.

Wallace Berry, official Tricolour photographer for twenty-seven years until 1974, has sent open letters to faculties and graduates soliciting business after his tender for official photographer was rejected.

According to John Koopman, AMS Vice-President and member of the photographer selection committee, Berry's original tender was significantly higher than his present offer to graduates.

"His original bid is not what he's offering to the faculties now. That's no way to run a business; in my estimation it's unethical," he said.

Prior to the 1974 edition of Tricolour, Wallace Berry was the only official Tricolour photographer. In 1973 a committee consisting of three representatives one each from Outer Council, Inner Council and the Tricolour, was established to accept and review tenders for the Tricolour contract. Since that time the contract has been given to a variety of photographers.

David Brown, AMS President, outlined the purpose of the selection committee. "The committee was established to try to ensure quality, obtain the best price for the student on a tender basis and to allow for coordination between the Tricolour editors and photographers," he said.

The regulations governing the publication of graduate pictures in the Tricolour state that only photographs taken by the official Tricolour photographer are acceptable. In a letter addressed to faculty society presidents Dave Brown said the only exception to this rule was, "Where an entire Faculty wishes to use another photographer, the Editor will allow the pictures to be reproduced in the Book."

Ken Robinson of Flair Photographic feels that the student's interest is best represented by the agreement which has been reached this year between Tricolour, Flair Photographic and Sparks and Associates. "The Tricolour contract is just too big for one photographer to handle by himself and guarantee the prints in time for Christmas. In order to ensure a full ten minute sitting for each student, Ernie Sparks and I have entered into a joint agreement which includes the sharing of negatives to be used for faculty composites," he said.

Vice-President Koopman explained why Flair and Sparks were chosen the official photographers out of five tenders. "Their overall bid was superior. Some students had raised questions about the quality of last year's photography and the portfolios presented by these two were of a greater quality," he said.

AMS also responsible

by John Bakis

The AMS must share some of the blame in the recent monetary foul-up involving upwards of $6,000 according to former Chiet Constable Granville Gibbons.

In a recent Journal interview Gibbons stated that the AMS auditors "still can't explain the loss" and that his being fired has "not done anything to alleviate the problem."

One major function of the Chiet Constable is to make up the billings and payrolls for each event AMS constables are required to attend. Every two weeks the payroll is submitted to the AMS who in turn pays the constables. The AMS collects cash from the event sponsors at a later date.

"People think that I control the cash flow. I don't. I just make out the billings and payrolls for the events and hand that to the AMS who in turn make out the checks and collect the money. Each month the Business Manager a full-time employee of the AMS makes up the ledger and from there she can see if the expenses balance. Gibbons noted that he never saw the business ledgers until April when Vice President (Operations) John Koopman informed him that the books were short.

"It was impossible to know it we were short because I could never see the overall picture," stated Gibbons. When Koopman and Gibbons talked to the Business Manager in April it was established that the shortage was detected as early as December. Gibbons' major complaint was that he was never informed of the shortage before April.

"The person who enters the figures in the monthly ledger would have known the books did not balance," said Gibbons. "It was never told," he said.

Wild times at McGill

by Eric Evans

Approximately 500 Queen's students made the trek to Montreal last weekend to see the Queen's-McGill football game.

A warmup rally Friday night at Place de Jacques Cartier set the mood for the weekend with 300 Queen's students joining the Queen's Bands for Queen's cheers and Oil Thighs.

Saturday proved to be an unfortunate afternoon for McGill University. McGill lost their flag, their goalpost, some bathmats closely resembling astroturf, and the game.

The Golden Gaels, with a 27-17 victory, captured first place in the division.

The fact that beer is sold in the McGill stadium proved to be a popular feature of the weekend.

The only problems that occurred to mar an otherwise successful weekend were the painting of the Queen's buses by McGill students and a broken foot suffered by an unknown Queen's student when the goalposts were knocked down.

Planting delayed

by Jo-Anne Stead

Project Green's schedule to spruce up the campus is behind schedule. The areas still under development are between Kingston and Theology Hall and the John Deutch central meeting area.

The Kingston and Theology Hall area plans have been delayed because the trees arrived too late to be planted last spring. The trees can only be planted in the spring or fall and are on order again, to be arriving soon.

Plans are also underway to increase the number of plants in the John Deutch Centre. The last shipment of planters and plants should be arriving soon. When installed they will give a definite contrast to the dominantly grey area.

Another project already in progress is the planting of ivy along some of the bare sides of buildings. This is a long term plan and will be conducted in three stages.

The Dutch Elm disease and the lack of university funds to provide trees prompted the formation of the club in 1974. Concerned students formed a group to remedy the situation, and was financed by Alumni donations and students' fees. Since the president and the founder of the club both left Queen's this past year, the group is looking for new people with fresh ideas.

Queen's campus is one of the most beautiful in Ontario and the efforts of Project Green help to keep it that way.

Photo war...

In an open letter to "Queen's Graduating Classes of 1979," Berry said: "I have devoted a lifetime to serving Queen's people and, at the same time, have contributed many original ideas to the production of Tricolour. Over the years, I have invested everything I have ever earned in the rapidly changing technology of Photographic Production to improve quality and to keep prices down. In a city the size of Kingston, I could not achieve these goals without the support of Queen's students. Without this market, the massive overhead is crushing my ability to earn a living. Bankruptcy is inevitable. There is no unemployment insurance for the self-employed small business man...no pension...no gold watch...not even a thank you! At my age, this is a disaster!

"I am a victim of 'peer-group' politics at Queen's and, as a loyal Alumnus of four decades, I simply do not deserve this treatment!"

AMS President Brown responded to the letter. "For someone who has benefitted from Tricolour contracts for a number of years, I find it ironic that this man has now seen fit to attempt to undermine the selection process by presenting letters which may mislead students who wish to have their picture appear in Tricolour. Mr. Berry is a victim of market forces, nothing else," he said.

added. "All she had to do was call me or send a note to my office informing me of the shortage."

It was not until April that he and the A.M.S. started trying to figure out why the ledgers were short, according to Gibbons.

"Up until that time I thought everything was balanced. Now they lay this onto me that we are short," he noted.

According to John Koopman, Granville knew there were problems before April.

"He knew mistakes were made but I feel he could have legitimately believed they had been corrected," said Koopman.

"I'm not trying to pass the buck," Gibbons stated. "I should have checked the ledgers on a monthly basis but theoretically I should have been warned books were not balancing much sooner than I was."

"When the books didn't balance and we were short thousands of dollars, somebody had to go. It would look bad if everyone was shown to be at fault," he stated.

OFS conference here

by Michael Allen

The annual Ontario Federation of Students (OFS) Fall Conference, which this year emphasized the major facets of the current economic hardships facing students, was held at the Deutch Centre over the weekend.

A combination of group workshops and plenary sessions dealt with the interrelated topics of student unemployment, tuition fee increases, funding arrangements for post-secondary education and especially "how we as a federation, are going to carry forward our anti-cutbacks campaign during the next year."

The OFS policy paper called for a "crusade" against the federal and provincial government's policies of fiscal cuts in education spending and job creation.

The central strategy of action that the report proposed was one of mass participation at campus level. Each college or university would hold its own week-long, "high profile mini-campaign", which "would become, in essence, a 'blitz' on the issues that students and the post-secondary system face."

In a zealous post-conference press release the Federation proclaimed that the "focus of the week will be 'to talk with every last student'". They plan to circulate a "mass petition" throughout the province (which) would be utilized at a meeting (the) O.F.S. has requested with Dr. Bette Stephenson, Minister of Colleges and Universities."

The conference also accepted reports on the status of women in the O.F.S. and on the affairs of students and institutions in the North, both of which recommended the development of special strategies to address the specific problems of these two groups. However, the conference was not at all receptive to the A.M.S. proposal to accept tuition fee increases as the means to maintain academic standards—a move which many delegates described as "regressive".

Before the close of Sunday's plenary, the delegates elected three members-at-large to the O.F.S. executive—Karen Dubinsky from Lakehead, Colin d'Eca from Queen's who is the past Vice-Chairperson of the Federation and Ed Segalowitz, who, like d'Eca, was previously a member of the Executive. For the position of Treasurer of the O.F.S., Chris McKillop of Western was acclaimed, following the resignation of Gord Howe of Queen's.

Brown approves plans

Woods

by Rob Southcott

AMS President Dave Brown was interviewed following the final session of the OFS conference.

When asked what he thought the conference had accomplished, Brown said he felt "a long range plan for fighting cutbacks" seemed to be the major result of the conference. "I think that it has become obvious to the federation that a lot more work has to be done," stated Brown, in reference to the OFS position opposing the predicted education cutbacks by the Ontario government.

The idea of a rally on Queen's

Park, similar to the one that occurred last March 16, also to demonstrate against cutbacks, is something that Brown approves of, though he emphasizes that it "has to be used properly."

"Tactics have to be more than a body count," said Brown, agreeing with an earlier comment by a delegate that rallies should be assessed on the legislative changes that occur after them, rather than "the number of sheep that are involved." Brown admitted that he found it "personally difficult" to try to represent the official AMS policy to support tuition increases, when he personally opposed the AMS policy. It was partly for this reason that he left more of the AMS presentation to Hugh Dodd and Rory Cattenach.

Despite the fact that he was "not pleased with the financial situation of the OFS" in relation to the availability of figures regarding some universities not meeting their financial commitments to the OFS, Brown was generally pleased with the outcome of the conference. He rejected any ideas that the OFS might be getting entangled in its own bureaucracy, saying that all the bureaucratic procedure was necessary to keep the OFS as democratic as it is.

OFS unity encouraging

by Tom Mohr

Miriam Edelson is Chairperson for the 160,000 member Ontario Federation of Students.

The OFS showed unprecedented unity on student issues at their fall conference here last week, according to Miriam Edelson. The OFS Chairperson said that while there was an inevitable element of disagreement, "generally, I have never seen such unity regarding the issues presently affecting students."

One of the issues leading to disagreement at the conference was announcement of the AMS Outer Council decision to support a tuition increase if it was necessary to prevent a deterioration of the university system. About that decision, Edelson said,

"You are putting me in a tough position. The policy of OFS, reaffirmed this weekend, is against a tuition fee increase. I would agree with the people of Queen's that more data is needed on the precise effect of a tuition fee increase. But I don't think one can deny that tuition fees constitute a financial barrier."

"The government is putting less funding into the university system, and asking students to pay more. Students are not willing to pay more for less."

When asked about her reaction to the new minister of Colleges and

Woods

Universities, Bette Stephenson, Edelson contended that Stephenson was incapable of adequately tending to the responsibilities of two portfolios (Stephenson is minister of both Colleges and Universities and Education).

"At the time I met her, she hadn't had time yet to address the issues. I don't have doubts about her capacity to do so, but I am concerned that the problems in both ministries are so great that they warrant much attention. Our concern is that the Ministry of Colleges and Universities will come second to Education on her list of priorities," she said.

Strategy session tackles issues

by David O'Toole

Over seventy delegates from OFS met on Saturday morning in the John Deutch Centre in order to plan strategy and set the mood for their organization this year. The initial piece of action to be undertaken was the adoption by the delegates of the Executive Report. As outlined by O.F.S. Chairperson Miriam Edelson, the main thrust of the report, indeed the main thrust of the Fall Strategy, should be to intensify the educational efforts of the O.F.S.'s core campus organizations. The students, she said, need to be made aware of the Federation's objectives and specifically, of the role it played in fighting the cutbacks currently being implemented by the Ontario government. "Before any efforts are made to organize a fall action of some kind (ie., a student rally), there is an immediate need to educate the Ontario student about the danger that cutbacks pose to the quality of education in this province," said Edelson. This educational process was considered to be especially important at this time in the year, when over twenty-five percent of the Federation's constituents are first year students who may not realize what the implications of the cutbacks are, or indeed the role that the Federation plays in advocating student interest at Queens Park. By the use of organizational tools such as petitions and local campus issues, the O.F.S. this fall will attempt to make the Ontario student aware of his right and his need to dissent against detrimental government policies issuing from Queens Park.

The strategy session ended with the adoption by the delegates of an amendment to the Report that had been moved by the contingent from McMaster University. In its final form the motion called for the immediate adoption by Queen's Park of three demands. These were,

- That the funding level for Ontario Universities not fall below the current rate of inflation.
  - That there be no tuition increase in Ontario Universities in the 1978-79 school year.
  - That the Ministry of Education reject the OCUA report.
- If these requests are not met, or no guarantees concerning them are forthcoming by October 18, 1978, the Executive will call a date for an emergency plenary meeting. At this meeting the feasibility of having a rally at Queens Park, or attempting any other action, will be discussed.

McBratney

by Julia Grunau
Miss Jean McBratney is retiring from Queen's University after forty years. A special award, presented by Principal Ronald L. Watts, was given to her on Thursday, September 28, in recognition of her "kindly interests and regard for people."

Miss McBratney joined the Registrar's Office in 1938 and over the years worked as Secretary to the Principal's Assistant, Secretary to the Dean of medicine, and Administrative Assistant to the Associate Dean of Undergraduate Affairs.

A native of Kingston, Miss McBratney noted that "the students haven't changed that much since I came to Queen's," and added, "I've enjoyed the work I was doing. I had quite a bit of contact with students and staff. It's been hard work, but I enjoyed every minute of it."

the century, have been moving closer and closer to the Atlantic Coast. At present the tribe has become sedentary at Davis Inlet, on the coast.

It is in this village that two students, Martine Samson and Richard Laforet, have led an ethno-historic study, concentrating on the different historical aspects of social organization of the dwelling place, as well as the genealogy and toponymy of the tribe.

Their study was financed by the Ministry of Cultural Affairs and by the Centre. Upon their return Mrs. Samson was accompanied by three Indians, Mr. Phillip Rich, Mr. George Gregoire and Mr. Charles James Pasteen, who were invited by the CNS to spend a week of their vacation in Quebec City as thanks for their excellent collaboration.

The researcher was forever praising the wonderful cooperation that the villagers had granted her. The greater part of her data was acquired through interviews with the elders of the village. The oral tradition is still rich in this community.

Robert Heroux, director of the CNS, and his researchers, hope that their relations with the Naskape tribe will remain good.

Bette advises foresight

by Mary Anne Tateishi

"Students would be far better off if they first determined their skills and then chose a career, rather than first choosing a career and then trying to match their skills," said Dr. Bette Stephenson in a speech to the University and College Placement Association in Toronto.

The newly appointed Minister of Colleges and Universities summarized the problems facing university students as: a rapidly changing job market, a lack of job forecasting resources, and insufficient career counselling.

Unfortunately, Stephenson has few definite solutions, acknowledging that the provincial government's Labour Market Information and Analysis Unit is too limited to be of any use to students because its job forecasts extend only to 1985.

The minister views future job market analysis as the key to solving the problem of student unemployment. Stephenson suggested that it is the responsibility of the individual student to research his or her own career and determine the choice between university and college as well as the most suitable program of study.

CFRB summer job "Good News"

by Sean Dewar

As many students were serving Big Mac's or pushing pens in dull office jobs last summer, one fortunate Queen's student had what can be described as one of the more interesting summer jobs available. Brenda Finley, a 4th year politics and english student, was the good news reporter at Toronto radio station CFRB.

As part of a program that started in 1970, Brenda and three other students were responsible for researching, writing, producing and announcing two, one-minute good news broadcasts heard daily following the regular newscasts. The four students were chosen from over 100 applicants from across Ontario.

Brenda hopes eventually to move into the field of media permanently, but aside from the beneficial experience of work at Toronto's most popular adult radio station, she had the opportunity to meet and interview a variety of noteworthy people. They included Sir Edmund

Choral ensemble hopeful

by Liz McClung

The results of last Thursday's meeting between Denise Narcisse, director of the Queen's Choral Ensemble, and the Wintario representative were extremely promising, although inconclusive. The representative expressed his belief that the Provincial Lottery would come through with the long-promised sponsorship of the Ensemble's European tour.

This summer, the Ensemble went to Europe to participate in an International Concert. Wintario offered to sponsor the group if three or more countries were participating in this concert.

Upon their arrival in Holland, the group from Queen's found that the third country was no longer able to participate. When they returned from their tour, the Ensemble discovered that Wintario intended to withdraw their support, apparently because certain conditions had not been met.

The representative was unable to reach any final agreement until he had spoken to the authorities in Toronto, but promised to inform Mrs. Narcisse of their decision as soon as possible. Both the Wintario representative and the director of the Ensemble feel that the decision will be in favour of the Choral group.

Political Funnies

by E. Caulfield Fleming

The Northern Lights have never seen such a fright as the Canadian Political System.

Presiding over the whole mess is The Queen. Our present Queen is Elizabeth II, an easy name to remember because it's the same as the ship. Some other famous Queens, in chronological order, have been Queen Bodicea, Queen Victoria, Queen's University at Kingston, and Elton John.

Directly beneath the Queen, metaphorically speaking, is the Governor-General. Some famous Governor-Generals have been Massey, Vanier, Michener and Leger. The first three of these men have lent their names to various important things: Massey to the tractor, Vanier to the Ottawa High School and Michener to the anti-perspirant.

Nothing has been named after Mr Leger yet because he is still at large.

In between the Governor-General and the Prime Minister lies the Senate. Sound asleep.

There are 3 surefire ways to get Mr. Trudeau to appoint you to the Senate. One way is to be a very smart Conservative. Then Mr. Trudeau will appoint you to the Senate to get you out of the way.

Another way is to be a very dumb Liberal. Again, Mr. Trudeau will appoint you to the Senate to get you out of the way.

There are more Liberals appointed to the Senate than Conservatives. Thus it is fairly safe to conclude that there are more dumb Liberals than smart Conservatives.

The third way to get appointed to the Senate depends on your ability to sleep in the afternoon. If you can, you're in.

Some famous Senators have been Eugene Forsey.

The House of Commons is where all the big action takes place. There are four parties and four party leaders, Pierre and the Three Whos. Sounds like a singing group, doesn't it?

Joe Who is the leader of the Regressive Conservatives. Ed Who heads up the NDP. The leader of the Social Credit party is Who Who. It's pretty hard sometimes figuring out who's who. I guess you'll have to look them up in the Who's Who. Ho ho!

Everything that Pierre and the 3 Whos say is recorded in Hansard. The present head of recording for Hansard is a nice lady named Rose-Mary Woods, who came to us in 1973. A sample of Hansard is as follows:

Joe Who: I'd like to ask Mr. Trudeau a question about employment.

Pierre: Joe Who, you big goof, what do you know about employment? You've never held a proper job in your life!

Joe Who: Well, at least I know where my wife is.

Some Hon. Whos: Wooooooo.

Pierre: and I'll bet you wish you didn't, too.

Ed Who: I am outraged!

Pierre: Shut up and go back to Oshawa, Ed!

Ed Who: I don't want to go back to Oshawa!

Pierre: Who does?

Who Who: Apportez-vous votre parapluie?

Pierre: Fuddleez-Duddleez.

Flora Who: Now boys, it's not nice to fight. Why don't we all go over to my place for a little drinkie-poo and have a little Highland fling?

by Colin Brown

Gilles Villeneuve is a man who would be champion.

He recalls his boyhood around home at Berthierville, Quebec and driving with his father at age six, telling him to "Go quicker, and pass the guy in front." And that is what Gilles Villeneuve has been doing all his life. At 26, he is the youngest and brightest rising star in the world's most sophisticated and demanding sport - Formula One automobile racing.

Its physical and technical demands on men and machines are staggering, and only the very strong and the very brave survive. These are the new Matadors. Their mental and physical co-ordination must be acute. If it is not, there is no place for them hurtling through the curves and chicanes of a track at breakneck speeds. Strength, exercised without emotion or fear. They must be brave - brave enough to shoot by an opponent before a hazardous corner or leap off a straightaway at full throttle, plunging through guard rails and catch-fences, and calmly walk away chiding themselves for their misfortunes.

It is a world of ultra-professionalism, and in one year this shy, charismatic Canadian has demonstrated that he belongs there. His entry with the prestigious Ferrari team was marked by a series of hair-raising spins and one lurid crash which killed two spectators. For a time the public, the press and many at Ferrari called for his removal. But those who denounced Villeneuve as a madman one year ago are difficult to find today.

He will be in Montreal this weekend, competing in the Grand Prix of Canada with the other Formula One drivers and teams. He will stand in the midst of the ever-present mob of journalists and fans with his hands casually thrust into his jacket pockets, his slight frame giving the impression of a jockey, not a man who pilots a twelve cylinder Ferrari. He will shrug and smile at the microphones and answer the same questions for the thirtieth time; yes, the car is running well and no, I try not to think about that - I only go as fast as I can. If you ask him about his past career of snowmobile racing in the wilds of Quebec, his eyes will light up as he pulls a bundle of snapshots of skidoos and fourwheel drives out of his pocket. "Here, have a look at these, will come his enthusiastic reply."

Then he will excuse himself and steal away through the crowd to spend a quiet moment with his wife in their trailer and think about whatever a man thinks about before driving a Grand Prix race. And then he'll go out to drive quicker and pass the guy in front.

Dodd rebuts critics*Fee motion clarified*The Editor:

I would like to respond to your news story and editorial in the last Queen's Journal concerning tuition fee increases.

First of all, the news story on page one gave fair coverage to the issue at Outer Council. However, I would suggest that the headline "Council Approves Tuition Hike" is misleading. Outer Council did not approve a tuition hike. The purpose of the motion was to anticipate a provincial government announcement on a tuition fee hike, likely to take place in the new year. If the government is to increase tuition, we wish to see certain crucial safeguards implemented to minimize the effect of the increase on accessibility and help maintain quality.

As the motion points out, the entire increase must be used for universities and must not decrease government funding for universities. Furthermore, the government must increase the funds available so that students unable to pay the increase are not prevented from attending university. If these two essential conditions are not met, Council will not "approve" a tuition hike.

Long-range goals of maximizing accessibility and maintaining quality must be kept in mind. However, we, as students, should anticipate and react to short-term realities, and attempt to minimize the effect of government policies that run counter to those long-range goals. The motion passed by Outer Council shows a commitment to the quality of post-secondary education in Ontario.

I would also like to respond to one other issue. The A.M.S. Outer Council researcher provides a valuable resource for Outer Council, and her presentation to Council was an informative one. Consistent with the rules of order, she spoke as a guest speaker before the Business arising from the minutes. She added input to the debate where otherwise all we had was a poorly researched OFS document on tuition fees, the essence of which had been published in the Queen's Journal on Tuesday, September 26, 1978. The researcher clearly stated her biases at the beginning of the report (i.e. biases for accessibility), and throughout the presentation distinguished fact from interpretation.

Sincerely,
Hugh Dodd
External Affairs Commissioner
Queen's A.M.S.

Do our OFSreps really rep?*The Editor:

We the undersigned are concerned that the Ontario Federation of Students is not representative of students in this province, and further, that the O.F.S. is neither promoting the interests of those students nor enhancing their credibility as a group.

This concern is based for the most part on remarks made by Mr. Colin d'Eca (O.F.S. Vice President), at a special meeting of A.M.S. Outer Council to discuss the question of "cutbacks". Inherent in our argument is the assumption that Mr. d'Eca as Vice President of the O.F.S., is representative of that body. Everything we saw and heard last night would indicate to us that the O.F.S. has become a pawn of certain political interests (not those of students), and is being used to further their interests. On several occasions last night Mr. d'Eca passed judgment on our political system and argued for a complete transformation of certain Western political institutions. Our quarrel is not an ideological one. The point simply is that this blatant use or abuse of the O.F.S. as a forum, for, and means of, promoting ideological views cannot be condoned. Students are an extremely privileged segment of society. The O.F.S. as it stands today serves only to destroy the credibility of students in the eyes of the government and the general public. P. Hila Mathews and David L. Lindsay

Our age is often labelled the "me generation". The stereotype is no passing reflection but instead, is a reality here at our own university. It is the kind of rampant social apathy, or perhaps one could say, elitist self-interest, which characterizes the large percentage of our student body. We reflect, sometimes with amusement, upon the placard-bearing, slogan-waving students of the sixties. Yet, we must also question: Where are the students of the seventies?

The past weekend witnessed one of the first Ontario Federation of Students (O.F.S.) Conferences here at our university. Its issues were crucial, discussion centred around university funding, tuition fee increases, and similar developments in post-secondary education and our society as a whole. The scenario, however, was very ironic, if not disgusting. Student representatives debated the questions, but few Queen's students considered it worthwhile to attend the workshops or plenaries.

It smacks of slavery, a small minority are serving the interests of a very uninterested, uninvolved majority. Of the few students who did decide to pass some time at the University Centre, a large percentage were very familiar pen-carrying Journal sleuths. They have the brass to criticize that Outer Council is misrepresenting student opinion when in reality there is no "student opinion."

Obviously, no one has a right to object to another's priorities, and no one should be forced to participate in areas which do not appear to be interested or worthy of one's efforts. But the prevailing apathy is not beyond our questioning.

As students, we live in milieus labelled as "higher education". Day after day we absorb textbook knowledge and write line after line of facts and theories. Where is this all going? Outside the university and inside these buildings, the world is in flux. Mac-Corry coffee might never change and most of the familiar faces remain. Elsewhere, however, there are new issues and these should be breeding grounds for a whole new production line of course-carrying students and probing thought.

Buried at Queen's - apolitically

Ghol

Maybe these are old cliches. Maybe no one understands (or wants to). That's okay; never mind. Rip van Winkle slept for thousands of years and he woke up not knowing what was going on either.

Perhaps next week we'll have a conference to plan strategies for Suzy-Q Week. You had better line up now. The entire campus will probably be there.

Tuition issue demands value definition*by Ross Finnie

The debate over student sanctioned tuition fee increases splits into two camps. On one side are those who argue that general government cutbacks are incontrovertible and that universities must simply share in the sacrifices to be made. Their adversaries claim that general cutbacks might not be necessary, that university cutbacks specifically are totally unjustifiable, and that education costs should not be shifted towards the individual.

What has not become sufficiently clear is the essentially different philosophies implicitly held by the protagonists. That is, what is the purpose of post-secondary education, who benefits, and therefore who should pay.

The pro-increase group would probably argue that (given our capitalist system) the individual is the prime beneficiary of an education (higher earnings, nicer jobs, etc.) and therefore, the individual should pay a considerable amount of the costs of this "investment" in their own future. The anti-increase group might however, claim the contrary: that the benefits of a university education accrue (or should accrue) to society in general, and therefore the individual should not pay the investment costs.

It is clear that the tuition issue is only one part (although an important one) of a much broader question. For example, if we agree that education is a social investment, with collective dividends, the income tax system should reflect this by taxing away any private return which justly belongs to society and should therefore be redistributed as a social dividend on the collective investment.

It is clear then that we are not merely seeing an isolated debate over a relatively trivial hundred dollars which might or might not be added to our fees. The issue inherently broaches the larger question of what society should be and how the university system should fit into the larger whole.

I think it very important to recognize this broader context. Marginal adjustment of the system - any system (in this case a fee structure) - should not be undertaken without debating and clarifying ultimate goals, which then define new courses to be followed. Students should consider the fees issue in this broader light and decide for themselves.

After you decide who does (and who should) pay for and benefit from university education - appealing to your own basic philosophy about society - the decision about the tuition increase should follow more easily. The issue is indeed an important one which merits your consideration.

Reopen...

Continued from Page 8 to advise council on just such issues. We had assumed that, since the movers had not given QUSACU the opportunity to consider the proposal, that they had rigorously researched the issue on their own with the question of accessibility being foremost.

It therefore came as a profound shock to learn on Wednesday night that the movers' arguments for a tuition increase were substantiated by a study prepared by the AMS researcher which was not completed until after the motion was proposed. There are therefore only two conclusions which can be drawn: 1) Either the movers of the motion acted in a partial informational vacuum, or 2) They were more concerned with preserving the "quality" of education at Queen's at the expense of the more general issue of access to higher education.

After having had time to digest the barrage of statistics presented to us on Wednesday night by the AMS researcher, it has become evident that this data does not in any way provide justification for the belief that tuition increases have no effect on accessibility. We are sure that members of Outer Council were as confused by the statistics as we were.

We would be perfectly willing to reply in detail to the researcher's report at any time we are consulted. However, the essential point to be made at this time is that the motion was premature and the handling of questions by AMS delegates at the O.F.S. conference here this weekend. Therefore, we feel that it is not out of place to make this letter an open appeal to AMS Outer Council members to reconsider their recently adopted policy on tuition fee increase.

Tuition hike debate: or necessary to maintain quality

by Rory Cattanaach, Vice President, AMS

"Outer Council!! Have they all gone mad?" "What right do they have to tell Betty Stephenson that they will conditionally support an increase in our tuition fees?" "So what if the university system deteriorates. I'll be long gone!" Many of you have heard at least one of the above quotations in this last week. They are all concerned with the AMS Outer Council's approval of the following motion.

"A tuition fee increase would be preferable to a deterioration of the university system. If a tuition fee increase is necessary to maintain the quality of the university system, it would be acceptable only if the entire increase were to be used for universities, and would not in any way diminish the funding which the government makes available for universities. Inherent in an approval of the tuition increase would be the condition that the Ontario Government increase funds available through the students awards program so that those students unable to pay the increase are not prevented from attending university."

The first reaction of many students is one of controlled horror when they learn of the AMS decision. However there is a method to our madness. I propose to explain this rationale under two headings—Accessibility and The Interested Group Approach.

a tuition fee increase would be preferable to a deterioration of the university system

The effect that an increase in tuition fees of $100, (we will assume that if the government raises tuition fees, the rise will not exceed $100) will have on the accessibility of universities to our youth is a highly contentious and still unresolved issue. There are a plethora of socio-economic factors which determine whether or not a person will attend university. The level of tuition is but one of many and by no means the most significant.

The Ontario Federation of Students, in its statistical bombardment of the Ontario student, claims that an increase in tuition fees will have a detrimental effect on accessibility. They cite the effect of the 77/78 increase of tuition fees as proof of their allegations. The Ontario university enrollment in that year suffered a decline of 3.2%. Of course, they claim that it was a direct result of the fee hike. However, the OFS neglects to mention that despite the 72/73 increase in tuition fees, enrollment rose by 6.7% in that school year. Furthermore, in 1977/78, enrollment in British Columbia's universities fell 2.1%, yet their students suffered no increase in fees. It is quite apparent that there is no statistical proof of the effect of a tuition fee increase on enrollment.

One of the major factors which determine who attends university is the socio-economic background of the individual. I admit that there are economic barriers to a university education as is demonstrated by the abnormally high representation of upper-middle class and upper class youth. However, these obstructions are not manifested in tuition fees. For most Canadian youth, the question of a possible university career has been decided long before they reach grade 12 or 13. Many lower class youths do not even consider university a possibility. They look forward to getting a job, a car, and making money after high school rather than obtaining further education. To overcome this subtle "steaming" of today's youth does not require lower tuition fees. It calls for nothing less than a more equitable distribution of society's resources.

It is ironic that the existing financial structure of our universities adds to the inequities of our present system. On average, a university student contributes only 16% of the total cost of his/her post-secondary school education. The vast majority of the remaining 84% comes from monies granted to the universities by the provincial government, which have been collected via the tax system. However, if you accept the premise that our income tax structure is regressive then at least 86% of all revenue of the Ontario government is raised through a regressive tax structure. This means that people with the lower incomes are forced to bear a disproportionate amount of the financial burden for the province.

a tuition fee increase will not have an adverse effect on accessibility

The implications of this economic analysis are obvious. The lower classes, whose offspring have been traditionally underrepresented at university, are subsidizing the children of the higher income families while they attend university. Although a change in the existing tax structure would be a far more effective way of dealing with this fallacy, realistically, this can be expected to occur only over a number of years. In the meantime, other ways of making the system more equitable must be found. Higher tuition fees for those who can afford to pay them is a means to this end.

It is important that allowances are made for those persons who cannot afford to pay increased tuition. The new OSAP programme will adequately provide this compensation. Firstly, a student is no longer required to assume a loan before they receive a grant. Therefore, those students who desire a university education are no longer forced to go into debt. Tuition fees are considered by OSAP to be an actual university expense. Therefore, if tuition fees are increased by $100, then all grants and loans will automatically rise by the same amount. Furthermore, thanks to the diligent work of the OFS, these students who are un-/under-employed can be exempted from making any contribution to their education costs under the new OSAP programme. Thus, a tuition fee increase will not have an adverse effect on the accessibility of the lower income groups, including those who were un-/under-employed for the summer.

When the opportunity cost of a university education is considered, the deterrent of a $100 increase in tuition fees is even more miniscule. For example, let us assume that a high school graduate has the option of either going on to university or taking

we are prepared to ask those students who can afford it to pay more a job which pays $8,000 per year. If the graduate chose a 4 year university programme, the opportunity cost (including actual costs and foregone earnings) approaches $50,000 for the 4 years. A one hundred dollar increase in tuition fees ($400 over the four years) would increase the opportunities cost of this individual's education by 8%. Hardly a significant amount.

The Interest Group Approach
A fundamental question which faces most student groups in our society is how we should approach the funding problems of the universities. There are two options to us. The first is the "Let's go for all we can get" philosophy which includes such demands as no tuition fees and living stipends for students. I do not dispute the integrity or intentions behind these demands, however, I feel that they are many lower class youths do not even consider university a possibility unrealistic in today's society and its immediate future. The second approach is less idealistic in nature. It observes the present economic and social situation and formulates its demands accordingly. The policy of any government, national or provincial—Liberal, Conservative, or NDP—is one of restraint. We will not see any revolutionary changes in our tax structure over the next 5-10 years. Contrary to popular belief, the manna is not yet ready to fall from Heaven. Therefore, let us strive for the most equitable system within the constraints of today's society while constantly pressuring for change in order to create a better future.

the deterrent of a $100 increase in fees is miniscule

The recent history of tuition fee levels has been highly favourable to the university student. During the years 1970-78, the Cost of Living has increased approximately 68%. Over this same period, tuition fees in Ontario have risen by only 40%. Since most under-graduates are dependents requiring a parental contribution, the fact that rises in tuition fees have not kept pace with increases in average salaries should indicate that raising fees a reasonable amount ($100.) would not create an undue hardship.

Finally, university students must be asked to what depths of deprivation they are willing to allow their universities to slide. Are we prepared to tolerate strikes and walk-outs similar to those which are occurring at York? Are reduced library hours and fewer books agreeable? Are we willing to ask faculty and staff to accept an annual 4% increase in their salaries year after year? NO, NO, and NO. This response is re-echoed by the Outer Council motion. We are prepared to ask those students who can afford it, to pay more, while maintaining the accessibility to our universities which now exists. Now, who can argue with that?

another hurdle for the student

by Colin de'Eca, Vice Chairperson, O.F.S.

"We must face the fact that there is no cheap, easy way to educate a human being and that free society can not endure without educated men." Raymond E. Callouhan: Education and the cult of efficiency.

It is becoming increasingly apparent that the Ontario Government has reduced post-secondary education to a low priority item in its all consuming desire to achieve a balanced budget by 1981. The social, political and economic consequences of underfunding the post secondary education sector for the future appear to have been ignored in favour of short sighted immediate political expediency.

In an attempt to fill some of the fiscal vacuum resulting from the systematic and deliberate underfunding of the system, some have called for a tuition fee increase, thus shifting the financial burden of government policy onto the student. Whilst one may reasonably expect calls for increased tuition fees from the Council of Ontario Universities, individual University presidents, and members of a certain political party, it is disturbing to hear members of the student movement justifying and/or passively acquiescing to such moves.

The consequences of a tuition fee increase are too severe to be ignored by even the most apathetic of the student movement. The commitment of Canadian society to universal accessibility, taken up by Premier Davis when he became Ontario's first minister of University Affairs stands to be relegated to an ideal of the past, and the future of Canadian youth and the future prosperity of Ontario and Canada is seriously compromised.

Students extracted a promise from Premier Davis that tuition would not increase for the session 1978-79. However, that promise is not rapidly coming to close and the possibility of a tuition increase is almost a fact for 1979-80.

In this thesis I hope to argue that a tuition fee increase can only have negative effects on accessibility, total enrolment, the future fiscal stability of the University system and on the future of Canadian youth and society.

Accessibility and tuition fees including tuition fees operates

the consequences are too severe to be ignored

differentially across the socioeconomic spectrum. Those from lower socioeconomic group and women are adversely affected by such barriers. It is these very groups who are represented disproportionately within our universities, and so stand in contradiction to universal accessibility. If social equity is to be achieved measures which serve to increase the participation rate of those traditionally discriminated against must be introduced and those which serve to further worsen the current situation avoided.

The Stanford Research Institute has demonstrated that a $100 decrease in tuition fees would result in an increase in the participation rate of those students from families of $12,000 and over incomes by 1 percent and those from family incomes below $6,000 by 7 percent.

the universities court the prospect of substantial decreases in revenue

It is salutatory to note that the lower income group brackets, yet contribute a disproportionate amount of tax dollars to support a small elite within the post-secondary system. Furthermore that personal taxation contributes a disproportionate quantum to the provincial revenue dollar.

The Carleton survey, and the data from Stats Canada confirmed these findings, indicated that 70 percent of students came from family income backgrounds of $16,000 plus, whilst only 15 percent of students came from income levels of $10,000 or less.

Thus arguments to increase personal taxation rates to compensate for this disparity given the current tax-structure are specious, as they would serve only to further discriminate against lower socioeconomic groups. (tax exemptions and benefits increase with increasing income), or that direct taxation of the student i.e. tuition fees, should be implemented will result in only a further bias within the system to upper income groups.

It has been argued that student aid in the form of loans and/or grants could compensate for any increase in tuition fees, and this has in fact been the qualifying recommendation of the Council of Ontario Universities, for a tuition fee increase.

However, it has been repeatedly shown that loans act as a formidable disincentive to students from lower socioeconomic classes to quote COU: "That such students are unlikely to apply for admission if support is available to them only in the form of loans; they find the prospect of accumulating a heavy load of debt over three or four years disheartening, no matter how generously the obligation of repayment is stated."

Given the nature of the present student aid programme, this pious hope is even further invalidated. Less than 15 percent of the families of Ontario qualify for full grant support, and less than 30 percent would receive any grant at all.

The failure of student aid to compensate the students own reduced finances is compounded further by the disastrous economic situation prevailing. Student summer unemployment reached peak and unacceptable levels this year. The July figures for 1978 were 19 percent higher than those of 1977. There were 2 1/2 times as many unemployed students as available job vacancies (although not all job vacancies would be given to students) and the situation is expected to get worse, with the Conference Board of Canada predicting in Ontario a student unemployment rate of 17 percent.

Not only has it been difficult for students to get jobs over the summer, and after graduation (so that they can pay back their loan debt), but their gross earnings have decreased in many cases. The Ontario Governments major youth job creation programme paid 28 percent less than last year - not accounting for inflation. In many cases government programmes had a duration of only 7 weeks, given the average, job search time of 4 weeks, this meant that many students spent a substantial period of their summers unemployed and without any revenue source.

Not only students ability to independently finance their educations was affected by the governments failure to create jobs, but the ability of their families to contribute to educational costs was also restricted. The unemployment rate for adults over 25 was 20 percent above the level for 1977, and the purchasing power of Canadians had decreased by 2.5 percent.

Needless to say unemployment and underemployment are differentially distributed with socioeconomic class, those from higher income levels finding it relatively easier to obtain employment and employment at reasonable wages. Women particularly are disadvantaged by unemployment. As a result any increase even if small in the financial barriers to post secondary education will result in a lower participation rate of women and lower socioeconomic groups.

Despite the demographic fact that the number of 18-24 year olds is still increasing (Stats Can.) Ontario has been experiencing an enrolment decline in its universities, and an overall decline in the participation rate. Last year saw an enrolment decline of 12,000 students in the Universities, and already Universities are reporting enrolment declines for this session. The predicted decline in enrolment for this in the system is 10-15,000 students, of which 9000 are "stop outs" i.e. non-returnees (stats

Can.)

It is significant that the only two provinces in Canada to experience a substantial enrolment decline (3.2 percent) in the post-secondary sector last year were Ontario and Manitoba, and these two provinces had introduced substantial fee increases (16 and 20 percent respectively) for that session.

the best way of assigning costs is not to put a surcharge on the individual student

The enrolment decline in Ontario's Universities (or 12 percent across the board) resulted in the Universities receiving $119 million less than expected from tuition revenues. In fact for a 1 percent increase in total revenue the Universities gained 10 percent enrolment decline. Whilst lower revenues than expected are the immediate manifestation of a tuition fee increase, the long term financial impact is far more important.

The amount of operating grant given to each university is calculated on expected enrolment by discipline predicted on the basis of the mean enrolment for the previous 3 years. Any decline in enrolment therefore manifests itself in a reduced operating grant a couple of years down the road. Thus in an attempt to increase immediate revenues the Universities court the prospect of substantial decreases in the amount of money they will receive in future, whilst knowing that their operating costs will increase due to inflation and will not decrease with lower student numbers, i.e. less people will have to pay for a fixed cost.

It will be clear from the above arguments that the argument that a tuition fee increase is necessary to compensate for a shortfall in government funding is specious to say the least.

In conclusion then any increase in tuition fees under current economic conditions can only serve to reduce accessibility to post secondary education in Ontario to incur an enrolment decline, and place the universities in even greater financial risk. The effects on society for the future as a result of undereducating the population would seem clear, the competitiveness of the Canadian economy can only be reduced, prosperity in Canada will decline and the legitimate social aspirations of Canadian society compromised.

The best way of assigning costs for these essential services is not to put a surcharge (tuition fees) on the individual student, but rather meet the costs from society as a whole. If the individual student does happen to benefit financially through a higher paying job on graduation, then he/she will be taxed in a progressive manner, as will everyone in society, all of whom benefit from an educated population.

Haunting style dominates Norwegian exhibition

Perhaps one of the most important art exhibitions to hit Kingston in a long time is now at the Agnes Etherington Gallery, Edward Munch: The Major Graphics. The exhibition was officially opened by His Excellency Knut Hedemann, Ambassador of Norway, last week. The exhibition from the Munch Museum in Oslo is being circulated in North America under the auspices of The Smithsonian Institution Traveling Exhibition Service.

by Peggy Walker and Madeline Mills

"I was walking along with two friends-the sun set- suddenly the sky became a bloody red- and I felt a tinge of sadness. I stopped, leaned against the railing, dead tired. Over the blue-black fjord the city clouds hung like blood and tongues of fire. My friends walked on and I stood alone, trembling with fear. I felt the great unending scream through nature", Munch says of his image of The Scream (1895).

The Agnes Etherington Arts Centre is very fortunate to have fifty works of Edvard Munch (1863-1944) from the Munch Museum in Oslo, Norway. This exhibition, depicting etchings, lithographs and woodcuts made from his earlier oil paintings, continues until Oct. 22.

The artist's haunting style reflects the sadness and depression which was predominant in his life. Several prints portray his obsession with his sister's death. Another major theme is portrayed in Jealousy (1896) after a tragic love affair. In 1908 he had a nervous breakdown. "A German asked me", Munch says, "But you can get rid of a lot of your troubles. Then I answered - They belong to me and my art - they have become part of me and it would hurt my art. I wish to keep these sufferings."

Ordinary, very ordinary. That's the adjective that defines the essence of Roger Whittaker's appeal. It's Plain Power-the cult of the modern man. It's pretty tunes sung straight forward by a very ordinary-looking guy, with thinning hair, who's 42 years old and looks it.

Whittaker is bringing his "plain power" to the Kingston Memorial Centre Wednesday night, Oct. 4th, and you can bet that his "ordinary" style will draw extraordinary crowds, just as it did at Massey Hall last week in a sell-out eight night engagement.

His career is no more ordinary than his extraordinary appeal. He's a graduate biochemist from the University of Wales, and some of his 400 songs have won prizes around the world; in 1968, for instance, while Durham Town was a top hit in England, New world in the Morning won three gold medals at the Brazilian Song Festival.

What was once thought of as a Roger Whittaker song has become the "Roger Whittaker style." That's why, in fact, he decided to do an album of other people's material, although he has continued writing his own songs. This is reflected in his growing popularity since the release of this album, "Imagine", an album whose title track was written by John Lennon.

With his individual zeal, and much unoriginal material, Whittaker will grace Kingston's Memorial Centre this Wednesday night.

Munch's "The Scream" - the expressions of a tormented mind

French folk redefined

by Sandy Graham

We folkies are fanatics. For instance, folk music completely dominates my day. I take a bath with Stan Rogers, thumb to class with Willie P., and study urban politics with Murray McLauchlan. I sleep with Colleen Peterson. Yet, I can accept what many people say about folk: there exists a very fine line between excellence and boredom. A single performer can, on one night, leave his audience dancing in the aisles, another night, he can have them yawning more logs than E.B. Eddy.

Therefore, I am generally receptive whenever someone tries something just a little bit different. Garolou, a French-Canadian band, fits no precise category except, perhaps, that of "just a little bit different." The music to be found on their recently-released album, simply entitled "Garolou", successfully combines some very fresh ideas with some very honourable folk traditions. The results are excitement, eclecticism, and a whole lot of fun.

Garolou is a direct descendant of "Loupgarou", the original werewolves of Montreal and eastern Ontario. Loupgarou became well known and loved a few years ago throughout Quebec for their brand of polished story-telling. Many full moons have come and gone since then, and the members have reformed under the modified banner Garolou, changed apparently because of legal intricacies. The music remains, thankfully, of the same impeccable imaginative and technical standards.

Garolou's roots extend much further into bygone eras than most other contemporary folk artists. Its personnel resurrect classic tales from the past, some familiar, some forgotten, and rework them to contemporary standards. Garolou's philosophy, I suppose, would be similar to that of England's Steeleye Span, whose members argue that, correctly, folk should be played on the instruments of the performer's period. Thus, Garolou has no qualms about incorporating electric guitars, drums, or even ARP synthesizers in their music.

The songs of Garolou deal with honour and disgrace, war and peace, love and sex. This last subject recurs frequently leading one to wonder about the morals of our distant ancestors. For example, the prettiest of three girls "Aux Illinois" repeatedly lures sailors into the shoals of moral corruption. This selection moves at an exhilarating hard rock pace, and features some inspired guitar soloing.

In "Victoria", an anxious husband tries to persuade his reluctant bride that "la nature est toujours la." We hear about the duke Charles de Biron, born in 1562, who goes to Paris "pour jouer avec la Reine". At one time a trusted military officer of the king, he is arrested and executed for apparent treason. Synthesizers provide the background for a juxtaposition of electric guitar and piano, instruments which, in counterpoint, suggest a strain in French society between deceit and eloquence, barbarity and civility. Biron's page rebuffs his pleas for pardon by remarking, "Si ce n'était pas de ta trahison/Tu serais mon ami, Biron." A superb piece of melodrama.

There is much humour and good spirit in evidence on this album, as well. "La retraite de Bonaparte" is a terrific stompin' fiddle tune, and includes some outrageously enthusiastic vocalizing. In the following cut, the band members relate, a cappella, the story of a tailor who is refused a girl's hand in marriage by her father, who fears she will be pricked by one of his needles. We also learn how a young man, dressed in feathers to make a living as a singer, is mistaken for a parrot by some girls, and then almost killed by a hunter. He begins to have second thoughts about his costume. "J'aurais voulu pour cent ecus/que mon plumage serait diparu." Garolou offers the poor man a solution in the next selection, a splendid remake of "Alouette": "Je t'y plumerai, alouette." Sounds crazy, but it's great fun.

Garolou's talents are overwhelming. The vocal performances of Michel and Marc Lalonde exude the intrigue and romance so necessary to much of the material. Their harmonies are at once intricate and exquisite.

"Germaine", the album's masterwork, demonstrates just how sympathetic the group's writing and playing is to the character of the stories. Although much too complicated to fully explain here, the story is basically that of a wife being tempted to break her marriage vows while her husband is "off in the crusades." The music emphasizes her steadfastness and reinforces her assertive questioning of those who would lead her astray. At the song's end, when she is reunited with her true husband, the synthesizers sound a congratulatory theme and suggest her anticipation of the night ahead.

Garolou's is a sentimental folk music, reflecting the joys and sorrows of seven centuries of human nature. It is definitely not for the boring.

Passion of Sanchez created by Mangione

by Brent Lavitoe

Chuck Mangione possesses his audiences in a way that few performers can. There has always been a hypnotic quality in Mangione's jazz, and his new album "Children of Sanchez" reinforces that feeling. I can think of no previous Mangione album that has blended such extreme emotional levels, which literally carry the listener, ranging from a religious fervor, joyous and passionate, to an equally sanctified calm.

The intensity of "Children of Sanchez" is a product of the charged atmosphere during the session in which it was recorded. Immediately following the extensive 1977 summer tour, Mangione locked himself away for the Labor Day weekend and composed the major themes for this landmark album. In a matter of days Mangione has composed and recorded twenty-three and a half hours of music. As he says on his liner notes, "With the music coming out of the studio at an unbelievable pace and at such crazy hours, the performance and endurance levels of the people, and equipment involved were constantly being tested. The intensity in that studio was unbelievable; it was 'feel time' all the time."

The title track begins the album with a beautifully coordinated duet involving "General" Grant Geisman's classical guitar and the soulful vocal of Don Potter. When James Bradley intervenes with his drum kit the composition takes off; Spanish brass blazes and everyone cooking in true Mangione fashion. The staccato drumming and punctuated horns add more than increased volume, they reach out and grab the listener. Mangione has rarely displayed this much punch, even on previous vibrant songs such as Bellavia and Maui-Wau. The "Children of Sanchez" track sets the tone for the entire album; the alteration between mellow and fiery jazz is regular and complete throughout both discs. There is very little middle ground, or medium paced, music on the entire double album. This may be somewhat of a departure for Mangione. His last album, "Feels So Good", displayed some equally volatile material but did not venture into extreme nor does it possess the raw edge of "Children of Sanchez".

Like most of jazz's great artists, Mangione is at his finest as a composer and as a musician when his creative impulse is given full rein.

The movie "Children of Sanchez" should receive a big boost from Mangione's new album, released last week.

The roughness of the album (which does not refer to the clean production) is owing to the nature of its many "live" recordings. The short piece "Lullaby" was recorded at three a.m. one morning, "the very first time it was ever performed". Mangione's electric piano is perfectly altered to simulate a child's music box; the orchestration drifts into the foreground from an infinite point and the simplicity of the tune reminds the listener of a long forgotten childhood age when fantasy mingled with the real world.

Side two of the album carries definite religious overtones. "Pilgrimage", part "1" and "2", features a circling chant and wildly erratic drumming which steepens the song in mystique. "Consuelo's Love Theme" follows and, once more, takes the listener world's away from the previous cut. Again we are treated to a first take of the song and the magic abounds. Mangione uses the basic Sanchez Theme and underlines it with a bass line highly reminiscent of "Chase the Clouds Away", the title track from another album. Cello, guitar, and flute all take their turn with the melody and caress the song until Phyllis Hyman's vocal takes over and completes the enchantment.

Mangione depends on heavy repetition to carry the album; after all it is a total concept recording, not a collection of songs which simply occupy two discs. If Mangione had cropped his material he certainly could have fit most of it on one disc and thereby enhanced its commercial appeal. Especially since the adulterated version of "Feels So Good" appeared as a single last year and enjoyed relative success in the top 40 one might assume Mangione was going the pop music route. For those who are only familiar with Mangione's music by the single from "Feels So Good", "Children of Sanchez" may disappoint you; Mangione is not, nor has he ever been a "pop" artist. When he develops a theme and repeats it throughout an album, as he has with "Children of Sanchez", it is to give the album a dynamic flow and expose all of his compositions' possibilities, he is not merely creating filler.

Side three of the album displays some of these variations. "Hot Consuelo" is a rapid fire reworking of the original theme while abbreviated versions of "Echano" and Grammy Award winning "Bellavia" are also presented. "Medley" on side four brings together virtually all of Mangione's styles and moves with sublime mellowness into "B'bye", a tune which Mangione insists has "hidden" inside of his musical consciousness for years.

If the "Children of Sanchez" has any fault it could only be that Mangione will not allow his listeners to indulge in the album without a definite manipulation of mood. The conception and overall performance is that powerful.

I must confess to a minor disappointment in the album. At Ontario Place this summer, James Bradley used a set of kettle drums on the title track to emphasize the dramatic highlights of the song. The power generated was twofold that which exists on the album, though the existing version is far from weak. Bass player Charles Meeks handled all of the vocals live and though he wasn't able to control his voice as well as Don Potter, the richness of his tone was ample compensation.

Bye the way, Chuck isn't wearing his renowned hat on the cover photograph. Take note you trivia fans.

Surrealism topic of exhibition at Agnes

by Peggy Walker

In an attempt to expose the public to new aspects in Canadian art, the Agnes Etherington Art Centre explores styles of art which providing historical links with evidence from contemporary Canadian works. The Art Centre is currently exhibiting a show on "Other Realities. The Legacy of Surrealism in Canadian Art" which will continue until Oct. 29. The purpose of this exhibition is to assess the degree of impact of European Surrealism upon Canadian artists, and to explore the links established between the two movements.

This exhibition presents the work of twenty contemporary Canadian artists who have drawn from the Surrealist legacy. These artists, due to their wide geographical range, work in comparative isolation and form no cohesive art movement. They have all responded individually to the traditional concept of Surrealism but their consistency is shown in their common use of the original Surrealist techniques of automatism, object trouve and collage.

Alfred Pellán, a Quebec artist, was directly involved with the European Surrealist movement. During his fourteen year residency in Paris (1926-40), he met many important contemporary artists such as Picasso, Braque, Marc Chagall and Max Ernst.

Upon his return to Canada, his exhibition lifted Canadian art out of its nineteenth century traditions. He follows the Surrealist trend in his wide variety of techniques and ideas, using automatic painting and drawing to express subconscious imagery and the functioning of thought. In Femme d'une Pomme (1946), an image is achieved through the combination of form, line and colour. He in turn, has had strong influence upon other French-Canadian artists, such as Paul-Emile Brodeur, who is also represented in the exhibition.

The younger generation of Canadian artists only suggest a relationship to Surrealism. Robert Carmichael in The Conversation (1977) concentrates upon the real image within a bizarre environment. There is realism in the actual forms and figures but he gains inspiration from the incongruities of life providing an unexpected subject matter.

The guest curator of this exhibition, Natalie Luckyj, will be holding a brown bag lunch at the Arts Centre at 12:30pm on Oct. 12. This will offer further information on the Surrealist movement in Canadian art and provide a background for a greater appreciation of the exhibition.

Golden Gaels master McGill!

by Don MacKinnon

With courage and fortitude the Queen's University Golden Gaels lived up to their pre-season billing Saturday afternoon, but coming from behind and defeating the McGill University Redmen 27 to 17 on McGill's own turf, Molson Stadium in Montreal.

Offensive Captain Randy Edgeworth summed up the Gaels' success formula with a simple statement, "This team never quits". Down 14 to 6 at half time, the Gaels roared back in the second half with three converted touchdowns, despite the untimely loss of starting quarterback Jim Rutka with a knee injury.

Offensively, the power running of Dave Marinucci up the middle (three touchdowns) and Tom McCartney around the end, were a combination the tough McGill defense found hard to stop. At half time the Gaels changed their game plan to make better use of the two. With the Redmen pinching their defensive tackles in, the Gaels outside running attack. That opened the middle for Marinucci and he broke two handoffs for long touchdown runs.

As a beaming coach Hargreaves said after the game, "It's hard to name names after a victory like this, because you always miss somebody. It was a very great personal effort of the team."

Equally, if not more important that the spirit of the offense in overcoming their first half jitters, was the inspired play of the Queen's defense. The defense held McGill to just five first downs in the whole of the second half and just one field goal. The secondary seems to have jelled into one of the finest in the league with safety Ted Tyczka and cornerbacks Tim Wardrop and Hugh Gallagher all making key interceptions in the second half. The linebackers Vernon, Andrew, Langevin and Balson effectively helped to shut down McGill's devastating sweep. Although the front four didn't record any "Sacks", they made perhaps the key play of the game when they hunted down McGill's punter and ace running back Tom Barbeau in his own end zone, knocked him off the ball and saw one of their number, defensive tackle Rob Ball, pounce on it for the Gaels' second touchdown of the game.

After a fine kick-off return, the Gaels seemingly could do nothing right in the first quarter. Tim Wardrop's second punt of the game was blocked on the Queen's 33 and two plays later after a thirty yard completion, Steve Geoghegan scored for McGill. The next time the Gaels' punter lined up in punt formation, he fumbled the snap and McGill recovered on the Queen's 27. The Redmen managed a 34 yard field goal as a result. With 5:09 to play in the first quarter the Gaels were down 10-0. Coach Hargreaves pointed out that the Gaels' punter hung in there and finished the game strongly.

Down 11-0 after a McGill single the Gaels' offense finally started to move. The swirling, gusting wind had been giving Rutka trouble, but in the second quarter he hit the sure hand of Bob O'Doherty 20 yards downfield, who then lateralled to Tony Manestersky flying down the sidelines. The play covered 33 yards before Tony was pushed out of bounds at the 16. Marinucci took a 1 yard pass to cap the touchdown drive, but in the process they lost wide receiver and placekicker extraordinaire Blaine Short to injury. A fumble late in the first half by Dave Marinucci set up McGill deep in the Gaels' territory but the defense held and McGill could only manage a 19 yard field goal.

Early in the third quarter the defense scored by recovering Barbeau's fumble in the end zone. With Rutka out, Bob Mullen came on to play quarterback. As the third quarter drew to a close, McGill got caught for no yards, giving the Gaels great field position on the Redmen's 40. A fifteen yard strike to Dave Best set up the Gaels on the McGill 23, and Marinucci crashed through the middle on the next play for twenty-three yards and the major score. The Gaels were in front to stay, 20 to 14. McGill managed a field goal in the fourth quarter but Ted Tyczka's interception of a Vic Pyowowarczuk pass at midfield, led two plays later to Marinucci's third touchdown of the game when he went up the middle for 39 yards and a touchdown. Brad Thompson converted all three second half touchdowns. With 5:30 left to play, the Gaels were ahead 27 to 17 and that's how it ended.

Encouraging for future games, the offensive line played well and Gaels ballcarriers responded with 205 hard earned yards. Bob Mullen who'd been doing a sound job in the defensive backfield stepped into the offensive backfield as the quarterback and played well. With Rutka injured, Bob may have to wear those shoes for a little while longer.

The Gaels, now firmly in first place, play Ottawa University in Ottawa this Friday. The Gaels must guard against overconfidence and complacency if they are to continue to win, but for the moment, they can bask in the warmth of first place and nurse their wounds back to health.

Success at Guelph Tournament

by Vicki Newbury

The Queen's Field Hockey teams travelled to Guelph this past weekend for their season opener, the Early Bird exhibition tournament. Both the Intermediate team, coached by Brian Groos, and the Senior team, coached by Nanette Cuddy, and excellent showings at the Early Bird, and returned in high spirits.

A number of rookies joined the defending champion Intermediates this year, strengthening the team. Among the four goal scorers, Chris Bowlby, Louise Barry and Heike Ziss are first year students, with Louise Barry scoring two consecutive goals against the Trent team. In a crucial game against U. of T. team captain Gillian Young gave Queen's a 1-1 tie with a successful penalty flick. Other scores saw Queen's lose to Laurentian 2-1 yet defeat Trent 4-1 in their first game and play to a scoreless draw in their second meeting.

Waterpolo team in the running

by Ken Davies

Queen's Waterpolo coach, Simon Beitler, ranks the Gals as one of the teams to beat this year with the OUAA schedule about to get underway.

The team consists mainly of veterans, as all of last year's starters returned, with the exception of all-star centre Mike Fox. Beitler rates Carleton and McMaster, whose teams are bolstered by Canadian national team members, as the major competition for the OUAA title. The Gals have been training intensively for three weeks and romped over RMC Saturday in an Exhibition game.

McGill game costly: Hargreaves

by Don MacKinnon

Saturday afternoon's football game at McGill left the Gals' head coach both happy over the win and upset over the cost. The Gals' quarterback, Jim Rutka, who should have been an Eastern Allstar, will be lost for the balance of the season. Jim suffered a knee injury when he went down heavily on the hard artificial turf. Wide receiver and the conference's top placekicker, Blaine shore is out for a week or two with damaged ankle ligaments. Brad Thompson suffered a similar injury. Coach Hargreaves finds playing on artificial turf mainly to blame for at least two of the injuries. He is writing to the league commissioner to make his opinion known.

The senior team are hoping to take the national championship from U. of T. this year, with the added incentive of their impressive play this past weekend, playing Toronto.

Both teams play St. Lawrence

University from New York on the Lower Campus this Oct. 10th.

Senior team Forward, Jane Wegenast, clashes with the opposition's goalie in an attempt to slip the ball through her feet.

Tennis Gaels fall short

by Scott Haig

Queen's tennis Gaels faced tough competition from York and U of T when they hosted the men's Eastern Section last Saturday at the West Campus courts.

Despite having what coach John McFarlane termed "the best balanced team in several years", the tennis Gaels came up short in their attempt to qualify for the all-Ontario championships to be held this weekend in London.

On a windy, overcast day, punctuated by the roaring engines of jet aircraft performing feats of aerobatics overhead, the tennis Gaels found themselves outclassed by the traditionally dominant contingents from the two Toronto universities.

York won the Eastern Sectional championship for the second year in a row, on the strength of fine play by their two provincially ranked players, Walter Crane and Casey Curtis.

U of T took the early lead in the meet with a strong showing in the singles matches, but in the final two doubles matches, Queen's doubles pairs Jim Skirda and Doug Dittmer, and Don Bradley and Mark Hooey handed the U of T duos heart-breaking defeats, which allowed York to merge the victorious.

Don Bradley and Mark Hooey put U of T away.

York's number one seed Walter Crane had a big day, capturing the singles title with victories over John Naccarato of Queen's 6-2, 6-3; and Graeme Hibberd of U of T 6-4, 6-4. Later on he teamed up with Bill Tsapralis to win the first seed doubles competition as well.

Despite the losing cause, the Gaels made a credible showing against their powerful opponents. There were some very close matches played, including one game between Doug Dittmer of Queen's and Don Lamont of York, that went to no fewer than 10 deuces before Lamont finally decided it with a cross court forehand. Lamont went on to win the match 6-4, 6-3.

Other highlights of the day included a singles victory by Mark Hooey over Bill Tsapralis of York 6-1, 6-3, and an absolutely scintillating match between Queen's doubles team Don Bradley and Mark Hooey and the York pair of Casey Curtis and Joel Sandler. The two sides battled to four deuces in the ninth game of the third set before York finally emerged victorious 6-4, 2-6, 6-3 with a beautiful cross court volley by Sandler to put the match away.

Mark Hooey, one of Queen's top players, took the only singles match. Bradley and Hooey seemed to be coming on in the second set, as they opened up a 5-0 lead on some sloppy play by the York pair, but Curtis and Sandler bore down in the third set and found the reserve they needed to send the Gaels down to defeat.

The Queen's Intercollegiate Golf Team managed to claim the fifth and final qualifying spot for the OUAA finals this past weekend, by combining for an eighth round total of 619 strokes York led all qualifiers with a 604 total on the short but tricky Cullen golf course in Guelph.

Cord Morland and Frank Dixon tied for 5th place in the individual standings, carding rounds of 73 and 77 for a 150 total. This led the Queen's team. Dag Enhorning was just a few strokes back with a 155 total, after ballooning from a fine first round 73 to an 82. The two other Queen's golfers, Neil Cunningham and John Kutevicius, finished the tournament at 164 and 165 respectively.

The Gaels head off to the OUAA Finals this Thursday and Friday which they are hosting at the rugged Dalewood golf course in Port Hope.

ME? BREAK INTO A BANK?

Like many other recent graduates, you may never have considered a career with Bank of Montreal. You may think that banking hasn't changed (for hasn't it had to survive your grandfather was your age. You feel that the skills you've acquired in college or university wouldn't be needed, or used, in a career with Bank of Montreal.
That's just not true anymore. The fact is, Bank of Montreal has become the leader in an innovative movement that's seen Canadian banking change more in the past ten years than it has in the past fifty. And we can offer you responsible, challenging points of entry into a dynamic business that just might go faster and further than any other in the next few years.

We need special people to keep us out in front.
"Special" means people who can effectively manage and motivate others and who are always perceptive and responsive to our customers' needs. A career within our branch system provides this continual challenge and a comprehensive grounding in business and people management.

The only common denominators with people who work at Bank of Montreal these days are the characteristics that never go out of date... talent, ambition and determination.

Maybe you haven't thought about a career with the Bank of Montreal.
But we hope we've got you thinking.
And you're never going to know just how right breaking into a bank can be unless you ask.

We'll be on campus for interviews November 7th, 8th, &
9th. To find out more, just

Discretion essential in faculty house issue

The issue of faculty houses arising out of the Commerce Society's request for such a house has become a contentious issue at Queen's. Last spring a committee was struck to examine the issue and after months of consideration and several drafts its final report weighed the pros and cons of the matter, made a few recommendations, but fell short of any final conclusions.

The inability to come to any final conclusions reflects the difficulty of the issue at hand. Opposed to the obvious benefits of such a development are the possible detriments of increased fractionalization among faculties on campus as well as a reduction of the University Centre's role as a forum for student interaction. Ultimately the future of faculty houses at Queen's now depends on the votes of Outer Council who will hopefully have weighed all sides of the issue. The time is ripe for a decision, for the Commerce Society cannot, in all fairness, be left in limbo any longer.

John Paul I

Is success measured by the length of tenure in office? Certainly not in the case of Pope John Paul. Despite his untimely death thirty-four days after assuming office, John Paul made his mark on the papacy bringing a relaxed and simple approach to his position.

He epitomized a fatherly figure, quickly establishing a warm rapport with the populace through his open, sincere nature and his gentle smile.

Although he had no opportunity to take up the issues currently facing the Church, he made an impression on the Vatican hierarchy with his unconventional style. He refused the traditionally formal papal coronation preferring instead a simple ceremony in the open air of St. Peter's Square. Where once the atmosphere in the Vatican was solemn, the new Pope introduced a more relaxed environment with his laughter and sense of humor.

He had virtually no experience of the Vatican and its politics, but he showed that diplomacy and politicking are not the only requirements of that high office.

Pope John Paul's reign was one of personality rather than action, and is thus hard to measure in terms of success. The office however, has undoubtedly benefited from his brief but warm presence.

At this juncture in time the decision of whether Faculty houses are a boon or a bane is merely opinion or at best informed speculation. If the AMS chooses to approve the houses in principle the move should not be beyond review. Perhaps any faculty house could be begun on a probationary basis with the stipulation that study be done after a trial period to determine whether its benefits outweigh any shortcomings.

Ideally, as the Committee's report suggest, faculty houses would offer a number of benefits to the Queen's community. A congenial meeting atmosphere, an opportunity for students to become acquainted with students from other years and possibly other faculties, and administrative opportunities for students are a few of the suggested benefits.

But the opponents to Faculty houses have good points as well. It is hard to say whether faculty houses tend to become insulated solely because of policy or whether it is a natural function of like-minded students gravitating together. Commerce students are characteristically a close-knit group, a factor enhancing academic survival as well as social ties, but certainly no guarantee that Commerce house would be a truly open house. Commerce should certainly not be penalized and denied a house merely because they are a unified group, the situation just emphasizes the strong need for the enforcement of an actively pursued open door policy if faculty houses are approved by Council.

"Here are the new recruits, captain."

Whatever their decision the need for discretion cannot be over-emphasized. Boon or bane, or simply not approved, the future of faculty houses is now in the hands of the AMS.

Law Dean faces resistance

by Tom Mohr

Sandra Aitken probably won't be at Queen's next year. Her talents as artistic director for the now-defunct Queen's Modern Dance Company, while in great demand in most of the country, are not so highly valued here, she claims.

Aitken has been devoted to the study and teaching of dance at Queen's since 1972. At that time, she helped put together a recreational dance program virtually unparalleled in Canada. Now, it is in a shambles, fighting to remain alive in the face of red tape and insufficient funds.

"Queen's once had the best recreational dance program in the country. We were the only university in Canada with a performing dance company that didn't have a fine arts degree. We were the leaders."

"Now the dance program is far behind most of the other universities, and we don't have any dance company at all. While dance in Canada has just taken off, at Queen's it has ground to a halt. It's a pity," she said.

The present plight of the dance program stems primarily from insufficient funds.

"Now the dance program is far behind most of the other universities, and we don't have any dance company at all. While dance in Canada has just taken off, at Queen's it has ground to a halt. It's a pity," she said.

The present plight of the dance program stems primarily from insufficient funds. In the dance company's first year, it received $2500 from the George Taylor Richardson Memorial Fund Committee. The Richardson Fund is established to support arts projects at Queen's.

The following year, Aitken applied to the Fund again, and received $1,500, a $1,000 drop.

"That really hurt me. Anyone in the arts knew the time we were spending, and the tremendously positive response we were getting. That just wasn't enough. At our shows we were charging the absolute minimum, so they were never making any money. We needed the grant badly," she said.

The worst was yet to come, according to Aitken. In the fall of 1977, the company applied to the Richardson Fund again, and this time they were denied any money.

"It was incredible. I received a letter from the committee that really upset me."

Queen's band to play at Can-Am Bowl

Band to travel south

by Warren Everson

The Queen's Band has accepted an invitation to represent Canada at the Can-Am Bowl game January 6th.

Organizer Doug MacNamera estimates about sixty of the band's members will make the 26-hour-long bus ride to Tampa on two chartered buses. The band will spend five days in Florida, a period that should give them time to practice, though it will obviously add to the expense of the trip.

"We'll have to do whatever we can to raise money," said MacNamera. "Band members have always paid for their own food on trips. Band travel will be the major expenses."

The Queen's band may have the opportunity to play together with the brass section of the Western Band, which represented Canada last year. However, it is not clear yet whether the London school will be sending a band.

The band will organize various fund-raising events including a dance-a-thon, skating party and chocolate sales.

"We're not sure yet just how much money we're going to need, and our fund raising program is not really set," MacNamera said.

In addition to the more usual methods of raising funds, the band will also appeal to the city of Kingston and Wintario for additional help.

Dean preceding Adell stressed keeping a balance between an academic study of law and a more practical approach, but "the present Dean is moving away from that balance" to emphasize more the theoretical approach, said Evan Blake, Vice-President of the L.S.S.

Steve Harrington, L.S.S. President

"He, (Adell), feels this should be an academic law school as opposed to a practitioners law school. That's the conflict, I guess," he said.

According to a second year law student, there are divisions within the faculty as a result of this difference in approach.

Dean Adell denied that any splits have arisen within the faculty. Though he admitted that differences exist, he stated that there were no distinguishable factions. Marvin Baer, a professor of Law, concurred.

"There are some differences of philosophy, I suppose. There are different feelings about how things should be taught, and what is important."

Adell began his term as Dean of Law in the fall of 1977. He succeeded D.A. Soberman, who had held that position for ten years.

"We saw Soberman in his last years when he had a complete grasp of the administrative details, and Adell in his first. In the first year or two you may get tied up in the job, which may lead people to think that you are not concerned about students," Harrington said.

Professor Baer supported this. "Obviously, with any new appointment there is a period of apprehension on some people's part. I don't think this is important anymore, at least I hope not," he said.

However, both said the problems went beyond the difficulties of an initiation period. Communications has also been a problem, he explained. The L.S.S. is concerned not only with changes in curriculum and administration, but also with the fact that Adell "has tended to do this without a great deal of communication with the students."

In removing one section of commercial law, Blake feels that the Dean presented students with a fait accompli. When the L.S.S. complained about this issue, the Dean said a

"The dance company was turned down on the grounds that the committee was not permitted to grant funds for more than two years in a row to the same project, when in fact other projects—such as the Performing Arts Office and Agnes Etherington—have been receiving money for at least six years.

"It's not that I begrudge them the money, it's the principle," Aitken said.

It was around that time that problems started to arise. Aitken decided to continue the company anyway, and try to maintain the dance program without financial support from the committee. Outer Council contributed $800, and a limited performance was staged that year.

Aitken's protestations about the decline in Queen's dance program resulted in a threat to her job as a recreational dance instructor.

"If the Richardson Committee hadn't cut me off, there wouldn't have been any problem. But when it did, the ensuing conflict about the whole dance program resulted in repercussions in the Phys Ed department that caused my job to be jeopardized," she said.

Aitken feels that, since 1972, dance at Queen's has fallen by the wayside. To her, it is saddening.

"I've been here a long time, and I've worked hard for dance. It is my life. Kingston doesn't have a dance program, and what we brought here was something people were wanting, and can't be replaced.

"They just let it go. What they've done is, they've beaten me. I just can't do it any more with their restrictions, and without their money.

"It's funny. Every year I came back here thinking, nothing more can go wrong. Every year they surprised me. I have no plans of staying here any longer," she said.

Pub may lose picture

by John Philp

Sam McLaughlin's picture may not be in the Quiet Pub much longer if an Engineering Society proposal to add the picture to a memorabilia collection in McLaughlin Hall is successful.

Q.S.A. director Sheila Murray said that the move stems from the belief that the pub is not the proper place for Queen's memorabilia. Despite this belief the AMS opposes the removal of the picture. Doug Wilkie, the Quiet Pub manager, claims that the picture "makes students aware of his contribution to the university". In an attempt to keep the picture the pub management plans to print a short biography of McLaughlin on the back of menus to increase student awareness and so defend the identity of the McLaughlin Room. Proponents of the plan say the Quiet Pub is no longer the McLaughlin Room but a pub.

The McLaughlin Room was named to honour Col. R.S. (Sam) McLaughlin after a series of major contributions to Queen's. These contributions include $300,000 for the construction of Adelaide Hall, $2,309,000 through the McLaughlin Foundation between 1951 and 1971, personal gifts summing to $1,835,000 and valuable historical documents for Douglas Library.

decision had already been made. However, some compromise was achieved. The remaining section of commercial law was enlarged to accommodate all students who had expressed a strong preference for it.

Blake expressed concern that in temporarily replacing several professors who are on leave, the Dean's choices reflected a greater emphasis on a theoretical approach to law. Although seven professors are presently on leave, both of the temporary replacements teach highly academic courses, Blake added.

Adell denied this part of an attempt to make the law school more academic. The first criterion in hiring replacements is the quality of professors available, he said.

Adell stressed, however, that students should be more aware of the importance of theory in the study of law. "Students are less receptive than they ought to be to courses that question the social effect of law and the moral basis of legal rule," he said.

"We're here to train people to think to make people sensitive to the way the legal system deals with problems," he added. Adell explained that students can do this just as well in the study of International Law as in other areas.

Pricing action criticized

by Eric Evans

Remember the 9% increase in pub prices as of May first? John Koopman, the person who unilaterally raised those prices, admits he did so without proper approval from the AMS Board of Directors.

According to the AMS constitution, the Board of Directors must approve all changes in pub pricing policy. However, in the spring of this year, Koopman felt that it was part of his mandate to keep prices at a "break even" level and as a result raised pub prices. The result has been a great deal of criticism from the AMS Board of Directors of Koopman's actions.

Despite the criticism the Board of Directors will likely approve the price increases in the near future.

Blood clinic draws well

by Julia Grunau

The Red Cross Blood Donor Clinic held at Lower Vic on Wednesday and Thursday showed every sign of being one of the most successful ever held at Queen's. Preliminary estimates put the number of students donating blood at approximately 300 per day, above the average for other universities in Southern Ontario.

"We're really pleased with the turnout," said Red Cross aide Pat Headley. "We generally get a very good reaction from universities. There are always lineups and the student attitude is quite encouraging." Miss Headley was one of 20 professionals and 50 student volunteers helping to run the clinic.

The entire procedure for donating blood rarely takes more than 30 minutes from registration to donuts and coffee, and involves little discomfort. "I was amazed," laughed first-time donor Marjorie Kirkpatrick. "Just ten minutes on the table and I was fine." More experienced donors like Vicky Perkins observed: "This is my seventh time. I like doing it because it means a lot to a lot of people. I try to donate as often as I can."

Once the blood has been collected, it is sent to Ottawa for processing into plasma and various other solutions. The specific nature of each allows diseases like hemophilia and leukemia to be treated with greater effectiveness. From Ottawa the blood and its by-products are sent all over Ontario.

In a heartwarming but unexpected trend, almost half of all donors were novices. Most, however, agreed with the girl who bubbled: "I can't wait to get my ten-pint pin."

This picture shows that a girl can still smile, even when scissors are stuck into her mattress.

Prosecutor speaks out

by Michael Allen & Tom Mohr

The A.M.S. Court system in general, and the A.M.S. Chief Prosecutor's Office specifically, ought to provide more appropriate services to the students and organizations of this University than they do. This was a concern expressed by the court's Chief Prosecutor, Mark Baker, in a Journal interview.

"Prosecutor is perhaps a bad name," said Baker of the title of his position. "It's more a place to go when somebody feels they're being given a hard time vis a vis another member of the A.M.S."

"I don't think that the main ambit of the court should be centred on its quasi-criminal role," Baker said. Rather, he felt that it ought to deal with student-against-student issues as day-to-day as phone bill disputes and rent disputes. All of these can be decided in the A.M.S. Court. If one side is not inclined to abide by the decision, then presumably academic sanctions could be imposed on the individual.

Baker also sees a need for a more precise definition of the traditional and constitutional disciplinary role of the court system which deals with actions that are "unbecoming of a Queen's student."

"This clause is too subjective and I don't want to see it sitting on the books this way. I would almost seize the opportunity to test the strengths of that clause, to define it in more objective terms. I do think there is a standard of behaviour which should be maintained, and that standard is at a higher level than what must be maintained legally."

Chief Prosecutor Mark Baker.

NDP- "No increases"

by John Baktis

The NDP is taking a hard line against tuition fee increases according to David Cook, NDP member (Windsor) of the provincial legislature.

Cook, whose position is official critic of the Ministry of Colleges and Universities, is on a province-wide tour of these major institutions with the basic intent to "listen" to problems.

"The NDP opposes tuition increases in every possible way," stated Cook. "Tuition should be frozen, if not lowered."

According to Cook, the NDP sees tuition as a "visible barrier" restricting higher education to people of upper middle and upper income brackets.

"An increase in the barriers is not a step towards their removal," he said.

"Our party policy is to increase accessibility to universities and our long-term goal would be to phase out tuition completely."

Cook also sees the OFS as a "lobbying group for students" that supplies information to opposition critics.

Cook added that although a $100 increase would not necessarily hurt the student today a great deal, it is certainly not a step in the right direction."

8 "Tricolor" Buses to go

by Eric Evans

Close to 400 Queen's students will get an inexpensive trip home this weekend courtesy of the AMS Tricolour Express.

John Koopman, AMS Vice-President (Operations), stated this week that six buses would be running to Toronto on Friday, and two would be going to Montreal. Due to the only recent hiring of a Tricolour express manager, Koopman explained, arrangements for more buses could not be made in time. Koopman felt several more buses could be filled since all available seats had been reserved as of Wednesday.

"It's simply a matter of price," said Koopman, "With the cost of taxis being so high, students can't help but be attracted by our lower prices."

Good food, good fares

by Liz McClung

Thanksgiving travellers triple up and save money. If you are returning to Kingston by either the bus or train, and plan to take a taxi to your door, this is something that you should know. According to the present rules of the Taxi Commission, the fare is governed by the number of destinations, not the number of passengers. If you and two other people can compromise on a single destination, you can split the fare three ways.

Higher fees for select few

Cattanach proposal inequitable

To The Editor:

I am writing in response to Rory Cattanach's article on the Tuition Hike Debate which appeared in Tuesday's edition of the Journal. He seems to feel that having "higher tuition fees for those who can afford to pay" is a means of "making the system more equitable". That is hardly the case; for how can proposing that one group shoulder more of the financial burden be "equitable"? Such a proposal is discriminating against those who appear to be better-off financially. Why should a select few be expected to contribute more to the same education others are receiving for less? Where would the line be drawn? Who would draw it? Who could possibly judge whether a student could legitimately afford to pay more?

Mr. Cattanach is asking that small minority of students be prepared to accept a very substantial increase in their fees... the epitome of injustice. A person should not expect to receive more than he is prepared to contribute, and this applies to every field, including education. Every Canadian student attending Queen's pays the standard tuition fee and receives the standard education. If certain students were required to pay a higher tuition fee, it would be natural for them to expect and to receive extra benefit.

I don't believe the quality of education at Queen's should be permitted to suffer if the deterioration could be curbed with a hike in the tuition fees. However, I don't believe the burden of this hike should fall upon the few who are categorized as being able to "afford it". If Queen's students are worried about the quality of education they are receiving, then they as a whole should be prepared to upgrade it.

Mr. Cattanach is Vice-President of the AMS, a group claiming to represent the entire student body of Queen's. I find it hard to understand how he could propose such a severe and degrading measure against a section of the very body whose interests he is to protect. I suggest, Mr. Cattanach, that you look elsewhere for a more legitimate system as the one you put forth is far from equitable and certainly not justifiable.

Cathy Morrison,
a concerned student.

Rory Cattanach

Affluence equals complacency

The Editor:

Last weekend's OFS conference seems to have come and gone without a single effect on Queen's university. Again the question arises as to how the AMS could possibly approve a tuition increase, especially when cutbacks are obvious to anyone who cares to look around; however, it is much easier to understand when the attitude of our representatives is revealed.

I attended the workshop on Student Awards last Friday and I was fairly disgusted with the "aside" comments I heard from one Queen's delegate. Amid complaints from other campus representatives concerning OSAP, awards officers, appeals etc., he kept muttering things about these problems not existing at Queen's. I wonder if he has ever had to apply for assistance.

According to the statistics published in last week's Lictor, the majority of Queen's students don't have to stop to think of the reality of this situation. Possibly they are too concerned with travel arrangements for sunny vacations over Christmas or reading week!

A delegate from another university campus informed me that the Queen's delegates at the conference relied on outdated research statistics. If this is the case then it is no wonder they think Queen's students are without such financial problems.

The solution to this misrepresentation is not an easy one. The 'forgotten minority' is, in many cases, too busy trying to defer fees, buy secondhand texts, find cheap furniture and keep themselves alive and sane on the little funds they have! But hopefully enough people will be upset, insulted, or even suicidal over the question of tuition increases that they will find the time to oppose Outer Council rather than passively accept a decision that will have a tremendous impact on them next year.

A. Boniferno

Colin d'Eca

Students can make own "hot air"

d'Eca not true voice of Queen's

The Editor:

I am deeply concerned over some developments I have seen in the past week concerning the OFS in general and Colin d'Eca in particular. If I am not mistaken, Mr. d'Eca recently resigned from an AMS committee (QSACU) protesting the AMS adoption of its stand on tuition increases, and yet today I read that this same person (who made such a show of divesting himself of any association with the duly elected/acclaimed voice of students at Queen's) has been made the Vice Chairperson of the OFS.

Who is Mr. d'Eca representing? The members of QSACU must be rubbing their hands with delight over the fact that their "former" member now occupies one of the highest positions of the OFS. It is, however, questionable whether the average Queen's student is in equal ecstasy. After all, if you don't like what he says, there is nothing you can do about it. It is bad enough that he is not a member or appointee of the AMS (and thus under no student control) but even worse, he has indicated that he is directly opposed to the AMS policy on the biggest issue facing the OFS today.

As I see it, the OFS is supposed to represent the opinion of university and college students in Ontario, but their credibility is strained if the OFS doesn't insist that the OFS members represent the students of their own campuses. In other words, members of the OFS ought to be answerable to someone other than the OFS itself.

If things remain the same I'd be just as far ahead if I took my $1.50 back from the OFS, bought some chips and beer, and made my own hot air.

Queen's "men on the make"

by Julia Grunau

I asked my roommate what to write about for this Journal column.

"Macho males," she replied promptly, setting her chocolate milk down on her tray with decisiveness. "Macho males and how they attempt to initiate all those poor young freshettes from small towns into their lascivious ways, and how they seduce them on tables and sofas before they know what's happening."

I considered this. How much behaviour of that type was actually going on? How much of it resulted from an image of oneself as a virile, potent, hairy he-man? (As opposed to a she-man? I never understood that phrase.)

How many people at dances meet each other, exchange names, and grapple for the rest of the evening? And was all of that due to overt pressure on the part of the male?

"No," said my roommate, attacking her tomato soup with relish. (She does not eat tomato soup with relish in it, she just likes the stuff.) "Everybody at Queen's is on the make. Even the girls!"

"Oh, my," I said, shocked. "Surely not." Girls are passive and innocent. Girls flail helplessly while men with white flashing teeth and soft waving locks attack them in pursuit of another notch on the...

"Pistol," muttered another lunchtime companion.

"What?"

"Biology homework."

I breathed a sigh of relief and wondered about life in general, especially biology. I wished heartily that pectorals and triceps would fade back into the slender flesh from whence they emerged, and that earnest conversation and idea-exchanging would become part of the social curriculum once again.

"You could call your article 'On The Make,'" said my roommate, thoughtfully munching some lettuce. "Then everyone would read it."

So I did.

Discophobia

The Editor:

I am dismayed to see that the Queen's student body is idly standing by while a gross injustice is being inflicted upon us. I am sickened to see that there is no comment by anybody on the renovations on the Queen's Pub. Why anybody puts up with Disco is beyond me, and so why should we put up with the Underground becoming one?

To this end, the "Queen's Students Against Disco" (QSAD) has been formed. We will look to the A.M.S. for support at the next council meeting, and from there we will campaign against this injustice. Hopefully we will turn back this tide of disco-lovers and return the Underground to normality.

Rally now against tuition hikes

The Editor:

An O.F.S. conference which threatened to be sharply divided over the question of setting a November date for a Queen's Park demonstration, (contingent upon the success or failure of an October meeting between the Minister of education and the O.F.S. executive,) ended Sunday with a definite air of unity and a strengthened resolve to continue the fight against cutbacks. A compromise proposal to hold an emergency plenary of the O.F.S. to discuss the O.F.S.'s response, following a meeting with the Minister, was probably appropriate, given the objections raised, (particularly by delegates from Toronto universities,) as to whether enough background educational work would be accomplished by November.

The importance of Toronto student participation in the success of a Queen's Park rally is, of course, well recognized. However, it is vital that this decision to not commit O.F.S. immediately to a rally, not be turned into a general rejection of a fall demonstration. While I am in complete sympathy with those who stress the importance of an intensified educational campaign around cutbacks, I am sceptical of those who seem to feel that months of lead time are necessary for this to be accomplished. Students are experiencing cutbacks now! With the full commitment of our student leaders, the necessary background work can be done.

The announcement on educational funding will probably come this fall and it will almost certainly mean a shortfall of government funds necessary just to maintain the existing quality of education. A tuition fee increase will probably be announced in February, and we can expect that the government will try to recoup the reduction in its university funding through tuition fee increases.

Now, those who advocate only a spring demonstration are overlooking two very important facts: 1) To demonstrate after the tuition fee increase announcement will be after the fact, and there will be little hope of forcing the government to go back on that decision then. 2) If we wait for a spring rally we will be faced with a serious loss of momentum in the fight against cutbacks as students return to exams and summer jobs. We will then be faced once again with the problem of re-building the anti-cutbacks drive in the fall of 1979.

In other words, I am suggesting that the success of our drive against cutbacks may hinge upon the decision taken by the emergency O.F.S. plenary this fall.

I think that it is fair to say that Queen's is capable of responding to any decision taken in many respects, our campaign is better organized and more advanced than many other universities, and we have shown our ability to respond quickly in the past. But, of course, it will not be Queen's students alone who will provide the necessary numbers for a successful rally at Queen's Park.

Therefore, I feel that it is the responsibility of our student leaders to take the initiative, not only on this campus, but in impressing upon the leadership of other student bodies the importance of a fall demonstration.

To impose conditions on gov't tuition policy naive

The Editor:

I would like to take this opportunity to provide another perspective to the statements made by Rory Cattanaach in regard to a tuition fee hike (Oct. 3). He asks if anyone can argue with his contention that a tuition fee hike is justified for students who can afford it? I intend to do just that.

Mr. Cattanaach labels all those who argue against his motion as selfish members of an interest group. I reject that contention and point out that the A.M.S. Vice-President has completely missed the point of a significant section of his opposition.

Mr. Cattanaach poses his motion as the solution to the spectre of deterioration of the university system. Is it really? What the motion passed by Outer Council claims is that we will go along with a tuition fee increase if the money goes entirely to Universities. One does not have to be overly perceptive to realize what has happened. A.M.S. Outer Council has been branded with the distinction of supporting a tuition fee increase, while the "conditions" have been totally ignored. This is understandable, and the conditions have been lost. They'll be lost when the government hears them too.

There are fundamental flaws in the logic of the motion. Firstly, it attempts to impose conditions on the provincial government. What is Outer Council supposed to do if the government says, "Thanks for the vote of approval folks, but we can't meet your conditions?" How the A.M.S. plans to enforce these conditions should be entertaining to watch, or it would be, if it did not represent such blatant foolishness.

Secondly, the motion assumes that one can deal in good faith with the Ontario government. This belief is so naive as to be fatal. This is the same government which has never repudiated the McKeough-Henderson Report, which called for the student's proportion of the costs of his/her education to rise to 65%; imposed a $100 tuition increase two years ago and promptly lowered the level of funding to universities by the same amount; claimed to be consulting students regarding changes in the O.S.A.P. programme, after the new programme had already gone to press; and which appears to be committed to dismantling Ontario's present system of post-secondary education. This is the group Mr. Cattanaach seeks to impose conditions on.

Few will disagree with the contention that a fundamental re-ordering of the social structure and with it "the regressive tax system" is some time away, as Mr. Cattanaach asserts. In lieu of this, he offers up the new O.S.A.P. programme as the defence of those who cannot pay the increase. Perhaps Mr. Cattanaach has failed to notice that in the last seven years this programme has been under-spent by over sixty million dollars, not because the need is not there, but because the program is unnecessarily complex! Student aid programmes (especially O.S.A.P.) will not help the situation. The Council of Ontario Universities has asserted that loans and the prospect of incurring debt act as a definite deterrent to students from lower-income groups.

Mr. Cattanaach's adroit use of statistics allows him to blithely state that because the cost of living has risen 68% and tuition only 40%, an increase is acceptable. Perhaps I missed something somewhere, but since when were students exempt from cost of living increases? In other words, costs for students have risen as quickly as for the rest of the population and a tuition fee increase will only add to that burden. A present, the number of people in the '84 year-old bracket continues to increase, yet applications to all universities are down across the province. While tuition is only one factor arguing against attending university it should not be lightly dismissed.

Finally let me reiterate my original point. Opposition to Mr. Cattanaach's clumsily worded resolution does not make one a member of a selfish interest group or blind to social reality. Opposition represents real concern for the accessibility of young people to post-secondary education, and fundamental objection to misguided attempts to protect that system, which instead court disaster.

The Editor:

I was relatively amused to read Colin Brown's attempt to tear a strip off flying in his column "Grub Street." (Journal, Sept. 29) However, he made some glaring mistakes while pursuing this subject.

First of all, he mentioned that errors made by pilots should not be blamed on them, "but the system which serves them." Absolute bunk! The pilot-in-command of an aircraft is never relieved of the responsibility to avoid obstacles and other traffic, no matter whom is giving the pilot instructions. Furthermore, Mr. Brown goes on to state that flyers everywhere rely on "a man in a tower" to separate them from other obstacles and traffic. I take this to mean that Mr. Brown would fly into a brick wall if he was instructed to do so by his "man in a tower."

If Mr. Brown is so scared of flying,

I wonder what he is like driving a car? Flying in this country, and the United States, is the safest mode of transportation there is, considering the statistics on deaths resultant from flying accidents. In fact, I wouldn't be surprised if more people have been killed crossing roads and railway tracks than flying in airplanes. I would suggest to Mr. Brown that he read the Air Regulations before making anymore statements about "the system that needs improvement."

"OFS reply"

The Editor
I must reply to P. Hila Mathews and D. Lindsay's letter "Do our OFS reps really rep?", in the October 3rd Journal issue. Firstly, I am not a representative of Queen's. I was elected to represent all students in the Ontario Federation of Students. The president of the AMS is the Queen's representative to and from OFS.

Secondly, when I addressed Outer Council I did so as a Queen's student and a member of QSACU. OFS never interferes directly in the affairs of our members' autonomous and sovereign councils.

My presentation at Outer Council was in full accord with OFS policy. The views and opinions of some AMS Outer Council members are, however, not necessarily those of the Federation.

What the writers of the letter appear to fail to comprehend, is that the economic situation and the response of governments to it is a question of political choice. We maintain that the long term economic needs of Canadians require changes in political policy and priority. It is the way post secondary education should fit into these changes that constitutes the basis for the Federation's work, and thus OFS is indeed an appropriate forum for discussing the future of Canada, including its education

The Federation sees as its long term goal (a goal subscribed to by queen's delegates at previous OFS conferences) the elimination of tuition fees, universal access to post-secondary education, and the use of a progressive personal and corporate tax system to achieve equitable funding of education and social welfare programmes.

All heroes

The Pedestal

A loud, talkative, brawny individual stomps into a typical Queen's party, demanding attention and seeking an ale (both of which he requires little). The "athlete" makes it perfectly clear that he is a football-player. Invariably 'they' travel in twos or threes, bolstering their presence, if not their egos.

It is unfortunate that such a character (or characters) feels that he should be placed on a pedestal. Some of them feel they are a cut above the rest. Yet the very people they are sharing their ale with are fantastically unique people. Each individual in the Queen's population has something fascinating, something extraordinary and some contribution to offer to Queen's, or to the community, be it through sport, the arts, music, theatre or education—each individual, at some time, belongs on a pedestal.

My plea to these footballers is to leave room on—or even get off—the pedestal and let someone else have a go. We of the non-football majority acknowledge your feats. Now please, you of the football minority, sit back and acknowledge some of ours.

(Note: This letter is not directed to all football players—only to those who feel the necessity to let everyone else know that they are!)

AMS research defended

The Editor,

It is too bad that the Queen's Students Against Cutbacks and Unemployment Committee (QSACU) are belittling the efforts of our AMS Researcher. She did a fine job of explaining how much of University Education is paid for by Ontario Students at the last AMS special Outer Council meeting.

There was a need for facts, and not impressions. To the charges of "conspicuous underhanded manipulations", BUNK! The Researcher was asked to do a specific job, and did it. QSACU obviously wants to rule the roost on this issue, and Ray Schmidt's performance was uncalled for. It was an obnoxious power move to try and shut up the researcher to suit his own plans.

Actually, I enjoyed the antics of the last AMS meeting, and I'm looking forward to seeing who is going to create a controversy at the next meeting.

Queen's secure future envisioned

by Paul D. Tinari

The 1960's witnessed a vast expansion of the amount of federal aid going to post-secondary education in Canada. The government demanded that each institution take its share of the burden of providing education facilities for the incoming masses.

Meanwhile, financing arrangements also changed, the much larger portion of the fiscal responsibility being transferred to the provincial governments. By 1977 the provinces were almost completely free to fund the post-secondary institutions as they saw fit. The result of this has been that funding has been drastically cut right across the board, and Ontario universities, Queen's included, now find themselves in a price squeeze that threatens to break the fragile financial backs of many institutions.

Hardest hit are the universities which were still emerging at the time when the first cutbacks occurred, such as Lakehead, Brock and Trent, but the largest universities which underwent the most intensive expansion programs in the 1960's are also suffering.

It appears matters will get only worse.

At Queen's things look healthier than perhaps anywhere else in the province. Queen's unlike other places, fought to stay small so the quality of education could be maintained. At the same time, Queen's has kept her ability to attract first-class students from across Canada. In fact, more than half this year's incoming freshman class had first class honors in high school.

At last report, Queen's was one of the few universities to have met its enrolment projections in all faculties except education. It is refreshing to note Queen's has one of the lowest student-staff ratios in Ontario, and plans to keep it that way.

Forced to keep operating expenses down to approximately $57 million in the face of ever-increasing costs, the principal asked physical plant personnel to take steps to reduce operating expenses.

Results of this request have been most impressive, as operating costs have been reduced about 40 per cent without any major inconveniences in the Queen's community. Should a need arise even greater cuts could be initiated in this area in the future.

What this indicates is that if the existing careful handling of funds is continued by the university administration, then we can expect Queen's to meet the future with only minimal declines in its standard of education.

I believe the present standard of student services offered here should and can be maintained, and any trend to the opposite should be immediately questioned by students.

In summary, in the 1980's Queen's will certainly become one of the best prepared universities in Canada in terms of its ability to handle the difficult situations likely to be prevalent in the country at that time. We can feel relatively secure that, barring any major catastrophes, there will be a class of "99" assembled in Grant Hall in the fall of 1995.

Moby Dick drowned out

The Editor:

Last Friday night, in a mood of nostalgic revelry, I went to see John Huston's classic film adaptation of Herman Melville's Moby Dick. Richard Baseheart ("Ishmael"), Gregory Peck ("Ahab"), and Moby himself were thoroughly engaging in their presentation of a tale that lends a pagan mystique and an unpredictable fascination to the living mass that is the sea.

Unfortunately, members of the audience, far more knowledgeable and intuitive than myself, rapidly grew bored. So, having clearly predicted the end of the movie, and having also unravelled every minute and subtle detail of character, symbolism, and theme in the first five minutes of the movie, they decided it was time to engage in something far more immediate than the simplistic method of a Melville, or the predictable and uninspired interpretation of John Huston—namely gossip.

In my ignorance, I grew rather angry, for I (poor simple dupe that I am) couldn't understand why these people found the recollection of last week's drunk more intriguing than Ahab's obsession with a sperm whale which had bitten off his left leg, left him with an ivory peg, a disfigured face and a lifetime's hatred.

But in retrospect, I can see now how stupid I must have looked in the National Film Theatre at Ellis Hall on Friday night. Yes, my inconsiderate attention to the movie must have been a real distraction to all those enlightened gossips who had paid their two dollars to get in—and by George, they wanted their money's worth!

Alas, even poor Moby Dick, in all his blubbery finery and oily passion could not overcome the intense interjections of "When's this over?" or "Is the pub open yet?" or "I had a vasectomy last week," though he must be given credit for trying, as he killed over one hundred men (including Ahab), rammed and sank a large sailing vessel, and gave enough blood to keep the KGH happily transfusing for months.

In all seriousness, the audience was intolerably misbehaved, and the absence of ushers in the theatre certainly did not help matters.

So to those members of the audience who made this evening so painful, shape up; and to the National Film Theatre I strongly recommend you acquire some ushers rapidly in order to avert many similar fiascos in the future.

Queen's the way we were

A pair of dashing young rakes

Off to the West

In the spring of 1910 quite a large group of Queen's students went, as usual to the West to take summer schools in Saskatchewan. This was to earn money to cover expenses for the next year at Queen's. Saskatchewan had fairly recently become a province and was short of teachers so had schools open for the summer months.

Queen's held their exams a little earlier than Toronto so Queen's got the first choice of schools. There were so many went at one time that we were given a special coach for the party. My memory is that it cost 20 dollars.

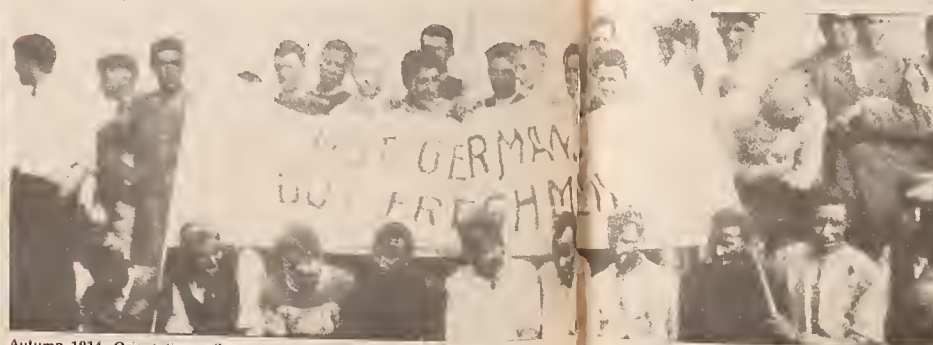

The coach just took us to Winnipeg from Toronto and after that we were more or less separated.

Board, Room and Expenses

IN Kingston the cost of living is considerably less than in the larger cities. The average student pays from $1.50 to $5.50 a week for table board, and for room from $2.00 to $3.00 a week. Rooms can be secured in private houses in the neighbourhood of the University. Board and room in Ban Righ Hall, or one of its three annexes, cost from $225 to $255 for the session September to April, depending on whether a student takes a single or double room; board alone is about $175. These prices, however, are subject to change from year to year. All first year women students under 25 years of age and not resident in the city of Kingston are required to live in Ban Righ or one of its three annexes. Full information may be obtained from the Dean of Women, Queen's University, who is glad to give women students advice on any matter pertaining to life at the University.

Fees vary somewhat with the courses that are taken. Personal expenses depend upon the inclinations of the individual student. It might be estimated that the sessional costs for fees, books, board and lodging, and incidentals would be for an average Arts student from $400 to $500, for a Science student from $500 to $600, and for the average Medical student from $550 to $650. Full details of courses and fees can be obtained from the Calendars.

We at Dimension Stereo pre-select the best values in stereo equipment and then put together well balanced combinations for maximum system performance. Our $685 system is a good example. The speaker system is so important that we have selected the new Advent 1. It uses the same woofer and tweeter as the famous large Advent but in a smaller enclosure. It sounds very similar but bass output at ultra-low frequencies is slightly less. Its great sound has made it a best seller over night.

The receiver is a remarkable achievement by SONY. The model STR-V2 produces 25 watts per channel at a price where others produce 15. We feel that this is the outstanding buy of the season.

We have added the popular TAYA CP250 auto-shut-off turntable for its high performance, attractive appearance and moderate cost.

At only $685, this system provides a big, room-filling sound that is warm and clear.

In addition, our approach to customer support is unique. Our staff are trained in both technical and sales areas—our service people are sales people. Our $25,000 test lab is used to check and adjust every unit sold so that it works better when it leaves our store. ## Horovitz farce opens vibrant stage series

by Julian Cunningham

For its 1978-79 season the Queen's Performing Arts Office is boasting a rich and diversified host of stage and music spectacles. The repertoire has been chosen with obvious care to insure that each theatrical and musical palate may be satisfied.

Among the most interesting of these offerings, is the "Vibrant Stage Series", which will include such celebrated artists as Vincent Price, Theatre Passe Muraille and the Toronto Open Circle Theatre, who will kick off the series with "Primary English Class", their first financial success.

The play is an hilarious farce from the pen of Israel Horovitz, the New York playwright who has enjoyed Broadway success more than once. Most notable among his successes was "The Indian Wants the Bronx" which starred Al Pacino.

Horovitz first gained recognition as a writer for the BBC. Subsequently he served as writer-in-residence for the Royal Shakespeare Company of London. "The Primary English Class" comes as somewhat of a surprise after a series of devastating dramas in which Horovitz frequently mortified his audiences. For example, "The Indian Wants the Bronx" dealt with the senseless torture of an East Indian. Another statement by Horovitz about the brutalities of urban life is depicted in "Rats", in which rodent-like humans attack a baby in a Harlem tenement.

The subject matter of "Primary English Class" is no less devastating; the only difference being that instead of crying for release, the audience cries for relief from convulsive laughter.

Horovitz makes racism that dirty word of the seventies something that we can all learn to live with, by cramming five immigrants into one New York English class; the only problem—no two students share the same language. Japan, France, Germany, Italy and China gain equal representation in the class.

Horovitz is quoted as saying that the Open Circle production of his play is the best he has seen, including the Broadway production.

The Open Circle has had phenomenal success with the piece. They are presently conducting a tour of six provinces. Kingston occupies two of the seventy-five nights slotted for the tour.

"Primary English Class" will be showing next Tuesday and Wednesday nights only at 8:30 p.m. in the Grand Theatre.

Israel Horovitz's "Primary English Class" features raucous racism and a language barrier that invites doubled-up laughter. The Open Circle's seventy-night tour stops in Kingston next Tuesday and Wednesday.

CFRC: Who's listening?

by Chris Copp

Queen's Radio, CFRC, is one of the oldest stations in Canada. Although the equipment and personnel have obviously changed, its archaic programming format could easily be mistaken for its 1922 original. When do they play classics? When do they play rock? or folk? If you're an avid listener, you'll know that it changes almost every hour. But if you do listen often, the chances are that you belong to the radio club anyway—so you already know.

The point is that CFRC has made a peculiar commitment to hodge-podge programming in the interest of "community service". If it is beneficial for the community to listen to "story time" one minute, Beethoven the next, and the Rolling Stones a bit later in the evening, then I'd like to know who's listening. It must be someone's 'hip' aunt who is tuning in, because the students certainly aren't.

CFRC has aimed its sights at the listening audience at large in Kingston; all musical tastes are catered to. The problem is that although most people tolerate various types of music, they tend to enjoy and understand a more limited range. Kingston stations cover a broad base with CKWS, CKLC and CFMK transmitting endless hours of pops, MOR and country and western. If your tastes fall into these categories, you know where to tune in—its a no-fault quest for your particular brand. With CFRC, it's a hit and miss affair; after a few misses, the effort is wasted, and another potential listener bites the dust.

But listeners are not a high priority item for Queen's Radio. Every Kingstonian knows that in September 10,000 students arrive in town. However, CFRC remains curiously oblivious to this fact. Students generally enjoy folk and rock music, something that is perfectly evident from the sell-out crowds at Bitter Grounds, QEA concerts and The Underground. Unfortunately, they must search diligently for the folk and 'nocturnal' rock hours in the CFRC program. This, I think, is an unusual way to run a radio station and a positively perverse way of running a university station.

Its almost insulting

LUV from Broadway

Special

The hit Broadway play LUV, opening October 12, will be the first major production of the season for Theatre St. Lawrence, the production arm of the theatre program at St. Lawrence College, Kingston.

Directed by Alan Argue, the cast of LUV includes Heather Bonham, Dennis Doherty, and Nigel Smith, (appearing with the permission of Actors Equity Association of Canada). Dennis, who is currently performing in the Domino Theatre production of Don't Drink the Water, was last seen at St. Lawrence as the bumbling king in the children's play Puss in Boots.

Heather Bonham has appeared in about ten Theatre St. Lawrence productions over the past few years as well as performing with the Domino Theatre and Bucksaw Hollow Productions. Nigel Smith has performed professionally with such companies as the Vancouver Playhouse, and appeared in Theatre St. Lawrence's first production Indians.

Alan Argue has directed for the St

Lawrence Summer Playhouse, the Academy Theatre in Lindsay, and his own company, Bucksaw Hollow Productions. His tribute to Burt Bacharach, Back to Back was Theatre St. Lawrence's biggest selling show of last season.

Steve Judge, a graduate of the Theatre Arts Program at St. Lawrence College, designed the set for LUV.

LUV opened on Broadway in 1964 with Anne Jackson, Eli Wallach, and Alan Arkin. Critics called it "a wildly funny spoof of avant-garde drama"; "an evening of unalloyed pleasure...of total tempestuous and glorious glee"; "the answer to a theatregoer's prayer".

To reveal the plot would spoil the fun. Suffice to say that as the characters dig themselves in deeper and as their misunderstanding and problems grow, the more the audience laughs. LUV was also made into a film with Jack Lemmon, Elaine May, and Peter Falk.

LUV opens at the St. Lawrence College Theatre October 12 and runs the 13th, 14th, 19th, 20th, and 21st. Curtain time is 8:30 p.m.

Zappa's show craps out

by Frank Mulock, Chris Towe, and Jean-Louis Amardeil

The most exciting thing about going down to the Gardens to see old Frank Zappa in Toronto on Tuesday night was the trip down—we were sideswiped, victims of a hit-and-run, almost killed! After this initial burst of excitement unfortunately it was all downhill. The concert was uninspiring. We should have been able to predict this on the basis of F.Z.'s humour during an interview we picked up on Q-107 on the way in.

On being labelled the ultimate freak—"I am the ultimate freak, I'm rational!.. People today are so tweeze-around... There are people who don't use drugs, who also don't like 'em, I'm one of those people... Most modern societies leave no room for cleverness and I have an excellent mind, no cute face or sharp muscles though... I am not stoned, I am on duty!"

On why he continues to record given all the record company hassles he has to contend with (he is currently embroiled in a 20 million dollar lawsuit with Warner Brothers): "I make music because I want to hear it. If anyone else likes it, that's cool. Many find it repulsive, they have Barry Manilow to fulfill their socio-cultural needs."

On being a bandleader who seems to attract so many virtuosos to his band: "A lot of people join to get famous, they get access to a ready-made audience, they come to me because they think I'm going to help their careers... I think those people are worms. They do have the chops, they can execute on their instruments."

As you might have ascertained, F.Z. is not enamoured with the whole record business machinery. He pointed out the packaging of his new album "Studio Tan" as an example of the extremes to which a record company (Warner Brothers) will stoop "To make illicit bucks." I can understand how his current legal difficulties have him "tweezed-around" by F.Z.'s performance. It was too short and the sound was horribly muddy. All lyrics were rendered unintelligible by the time they reached us and we were seated on the main floor—pity the poor Zappaphiles in the cheap seats!

Morrissey is notorious for his films made in conjunction with Andy Warhol. He has directed new versions of Dracula and Frankenstein (both in 3-D), as well as earlier work like Lonesome Cowboys, Flesh, and Heat. All noted for their excess and blatant mixture of sex and violence. The Hound of the Baskervilles seems controlled in comparison. It is definitely not a great comedy, but the work of Peter Cook and Dudley Moore is a joy to experience as they rework some old routines from their Beyond The Fringe days and overact with great style.

Good taste and finesse are not to be found in this movie, but the humour is certainly more inspired than a film such as Animal House. Part of the problem lies in a sluggish plot structure and editing style, and that Cook and Moore are separated too often. They interact well and seem to improvise nicely. Evidence of this is a great scene in which Cook plays the role of a nervous one-legged man coming to Holmes for a job. Holmes attempts to "talk around" the man's lack of limb, but constantly chooses the wrong words that cause Cook to flinch in humiliation. Sounds weird, but it's really funny. It's too bad this scene is an isolated example, as The Hound of the Baskervilles works better on the level of stand-up comedy than as a take-off of Arthur Conan Doyle's famous detective team.

Most of the first half consisted of new material, notable only for a few of F.Z.'s excursions on electric. The second half was better—all of F.Z.'s AM smashes were featured.

The only redeeming feature of the evening was some of Zappa's inspirational verse featured in his radio interview:

"Information does not equal knowledge and knowledge does not equal wisdom and wisdom does not equal truth and truth does not equal beauty and beauty does not equal love and love does not equal music... Because music is the best!"

Unfortunately Tuesday evening the music was only mediocre.

Rugby Gaels work for stunning win

by Don Cameron

The Queen's Rugby Club, posted a 3-0 record with a 24-3 rout of the RMC Redmen, are now in sole possession of first place. The Gaels have not had any tries scored against them in the three matches to date.

Saturday's game against the Redmen started off slowly but opened up when Paul Lemmon took the ball on the fly inside RMC's 22 meter line and drove over for the try, converted to Costeloe. Queen's then began to play good rugby with the forwards pushing RMC off the ball, to pre-season injuries, powered his way through the Red men for the last score of the half.

The Gaels with a 14-0 lead continued to outplay The Redmen in the second half. The backs worked together with a fluency seldom seen at university level rugby. Steve "Zulu" Wilson scored on a well executed scissors play which caught the Redmen unaware. Queen's ended the game on a strong note with an over-the-end-line out pass by Rob Bruce to Jim Stone, who scored to make the final count 24-3 for Queen's. Stone was undoubtedly the outstanding player of the match, running strongly and intimidating RMC with his aggressive tackling.

The Queen's Rugby Club hosted the Dinosaurs (Old Boy's) Rugby Club on Sunday. The game was an opportunity for the Old Boy's to get their yearly exercise quota. Playing with 16 men, the old boys, with a try by Dave Cook, and a conversion plus two penalty kicks by Ron "Wanker" Estele, managed to squeak by the QRC 12-3. Queen's three points were scored on a penalty kick by John Reid.

Queen's seconds won an exhibition match against a team from Carlton University on Wednesday night. Despite adverse weather conditions the Rugby Gaels racked up 15 points with tries by "Jets" Cottingham, Chris Shannon, and Andy Boright. Dennis Johnson kicked a conversion and a penalty kick to round out the scoring. Carlton's teams coached by Queen's Old Boy Alan Frizzella was formed this year and has hopes of playing in the OUA rugby league for the 1979 season. Another Queen's Old Boy, Chris Bovaired refereed the game and despite his efforts Queen's won by a score of 15-9.

giving the backs an opportunity to run. The second try of the game was set up by wing forward Jim Stone who took the ball on a pass from Bill Payne at mid-field. Stoner romped 65 yards down the sidelines and on being tackled only inches away from the try line, flipped the ball up to the Cameron who went over for the score.

Four games, four wins

Soccer shines once more

by Benny

Four games, four wins; not bad for a team that wasn't considered as a force to be reckoned with this year. With the pre-season tournament and second-team games included, the Gaels have now won 8 games in a row. Coach John Walker was even seen sporting a broad smile after last weekend's back to back victories.

Saturday's match against Guelph was typical of what the Gaels have done thus far this season. The first half was unsettled and scoreless as both teams were hampered by the wind. Although the referee was in complete control throughout the half, inevitably collisions between players occurred. These bumps and bruises started to take their toll in the second half, as the Gaels fitness showed through. Again it was Striker Andy Goodman who lit the flame by heading home Mark Bennett's cross, giving Queen's the lead. Wally Klus snuffed out any comeback thoughts of the Gryphons by rocketing home one of his patented shots to complete the 2-0 win.

Against Waterloo the following day it was a revamped Queen's squad that led the charge. Mike Appleby and Peter Smith filled in admirably, giving Walker more breathing room when naming his starting eleven. Waterloo, an OUA finalist last year, was brimming with confidence after thrashing RMC on Saturday, but the Gaels changed all that with two first-half goals. Tom Bencke slipped a shot just inside the post to open the scoring and the omnipresent Goodman-McChie combination put Queen's 2 up as the former nearly tore the back off the net with one of his now typical headers.

Both teams began to feel the effects of the pace when a bloop chip shot nestled under the bar to put Waterloo back into the match. Moments later, Carl Saunders managed to get his fingertips on a shot that inexplicably rebounded back onto the field of play to a waiting Waterloo player who scored. The referee signaled a goal, as did the linesman nearest the play, but after a heated discussion between the Gaels and the ref, it was decided the ball had hit the football posts above the cross bar, and should have been whistled dead immediately. Despite anguished protests by Waterloo, the decision stood and the 2-1 victory was preserved. The Gaels had swept a two game series for the second weekend in a row thus grabbing top spot in the league table.

Notes: Steve McKay and Alan Stewart were standouts in the weekend games.

Austin McChie and Mark Bennett have been named to the OUA all-star team, which is scheduled to play the Canadian Youth Team.

Athletes of the Week

Thus far, Queen's is enjoying one of its most successful sports seasons in a number of years. Queen's Football, Rugby and Soccer teams are all undefeated. Field Hockey made an impressive showing last weekend and our track and field athletes are doing exceptionally well. The purpose of this column is to recognize our teams and the outstanding individual performances that supported them.

The Queen's Golden Gaels Football team defeated McGill 27-17. Dave Marinucci, behind the strong blocking of John Wilson, Randy Edgeworth and Pat Pliska led the Gaels scoring with 3 touchdowns.

An outstanding performance by Jim Stone aided the Rugby Gaels in a 24-3 victory over RMC Redmen.

Charlie Hitchon paced the Queen's track team in Hamilton with 2 first place finishes. Charlie won the 800 metres in 1:57.4 sec. and took the 400 metres as well with a time of 50.5 sec.

Note: To insure that your team players are considered for this column, please have the proper forms submitted to the Supervisor of Athletic Events - Rick Powers by the Monday morning following competitions.

Take title fifth year running

X-C men return victorious

by Fox and Rox

Despite the absence of some top runners, the men's Cross-Country team kept their undefeated record intact by winning the York Invitational Team title on Saturday for the fifth straight year. The victory pointed out the depth of this year's team as several of the runners did surprisingly well.

Rob Livingston continued his comeback with an excellent third place finish just behind the two national team members. His time was 31.07 over the fast 10,000 metre course. Grouped not far behind were Mike DeGuida 7th, Jeff Bellinger 8th and Ian Gale 10th running 32:02. Rookie Bruce MacIntyre had a successful debut running 32:40, good for 17th place. A mere two seconds behind was Sandy MacAuley, also on the queen's A team.

Queen's had a second team entered in a field of over one hundred runners: Les McGregor, Lawrence Elliott, Colin Funk, Dan Quance and Jean-Paul Spessot all performed well for the "Tricolour".

The Thanksgiving weekend brings the yearly road trip to the frat house of Lehigh University in Pennsylvania for the Lehigh Invitational Cross Country meet; excellent competition from top schools in the eastern U.S.

Queen's Cross-Country runners won the York Invitational to keep their undefeated record intact.

Boneman's Byline

This past weekend the Queen's Golden Gaels extended their record to 3-0 but at considerable cost. Serious injuries were suffered by Jim Rutka, who is out for the season, and Blaine Shore. Both these players are key members of the offence, and their presence will be sorely missed tonight against Ottawa. The crux of the problem is that both of these unfortunate injuries can no doubt be partly attributed to the artificial surface at Molson Stadium.

As shown by Coach Hargreaves' letter to the commissioner there seems to be a strong outcry against the use of artificial surface in Canadian College football. Unlike NCAA football, our college game is played by the majority of schools on real grass. To subject visiting teams to play on artificial turf at McGill and the University of Calgary is an unfair and hazardous requirement. Not only do McGill and Calgary have the opportunity to practise on this surface, they also can outfit their teams with special equipment better suited for artificial surfaces. It is fairly expensive to outfit a visiting team with special cleats and pads to reduce "rug-burn" for just one game a season.

It is for these reasons that college football should not be played on artificial turf in Canada. Hopefully the CIAU hierarchy will come to a similar conclusion in the very near future.

McMaster track good warm-up

by Jeff Bellinger

The Queen's Track and Field Team competed in their first intercollegiate Track Meet of the 1978 season last weekend when they travelled to Hamilton for the McMaster Invitational. As defending champions, the men's team is again very competitive and will be vying for top honours on the track. The women's team is much larger this year and the "new" talent combined with the veteran's experience, will make the team a competitive force to be reckoned with. All experience gained in early meets will help the team in their quest for the OUAA and OWIAA titles. Queen's will host the championship this year on October twenty-first.

The coaches' general consensus concerning McMaster was that it served as a "good warm-up" for what will eventually prove to be a long, tough season. Many athletes performed well, but the Queen's stars were definitely Charlie Hitcon (50.5 400m and 1:57.8 800m), Mark Diboll (48.77m javelin, a P.B.), and Jim Morrison (1st 400m hurdles). Queen's distance people travelled to the York Invitational Cross-Country Meet which made the team predominately a sprinting and field group. Jeff Starwick, Dan Rocheleau, Rick White and Jim Wilson all ran well. Leslie Martin, Leslie Lamoure, Michelle Fennell, Janet Schultz, Laurin MacWilliam and Mary Cutler all provided the team with good sprint power.

The field team had some problems, but with up-coming meets, all athletes will be in a good position to achieve the potential they possess and performances will peak at the OUAA-OWIAA championships. The Waterloo Invitational is taking place today and our runners, throwers and jumpers will pass up and performances will peak at the

Stiff competition at York

Strong show for women runners

by Fox and Rox

The second competition of the year for the Queen's Women's Cross-Country team sent the girls up against the stiffest competition in Ontario. The team travelled to York University on Saturday to face a field of 75 runners from 8 universities.

Leading the way again was Cathy Clark who finished 8th with a time of 19:08 for the 5000 metre course. Debbie Pettigrew, another strong rookie, placed 12th, while veteran Sue Spence rounded out the top 20 finishers.

A strong group performance from Vicki Gibbons, Connie Nehr and Lee-Anne Poland, finishing 25th, 26th, and 27th respectively, secured the 7th and 8th positions for the A and B teams.

Christine Pratt and Bev Code both finished in the top half of the field to complete the results of the Queen's women.

A serious ankle injury sustained by Florence McCrimmon was the only disappointment of the day. All cross-country enthusiasts hope that Florence can return to training quickly and recapture her excellent early season form.

The Waterloo Invitational Meet is the major attraction for next weekend in preparation for the up-coming OWIAA finals.

"GET INVOLVED"

Trainer keeps forty teams in shape

Queen's athletes in good hands

by Mark Migotti

Articles written about team trainers immediately tend to trot out bromides such as "unsung hero" or "forgotten man" in describing their subject. But with reference to "Tabby" Gow, the clichés are fully deserved. He is the trainer for all 40 Queen's University's intercollegiate athletic teams. As Tabby puts it, "the trainer is responsible for the health of the club... both on and off the field." This means that Tabby and his five associates are responsible for the health of some five hundred athletes, a Herculean task by any standards.

Gow came to his post via four years in the army medical corps. He then spent sixteen years as pool radically changed during his time at Queen's, he does admit that today's players are bigger and stronger. "Whereas twenty years ago it would have been a rarity to see a lineman chase and catch a quarterback, it is now a common occurrence", he commented.

Of course, the field of sports medicine itself is constantly improving. In fact, Queen's is presently contemplating holding a clinic on sports medicine. Gow stated that the clinic would be a reality within two or three years. Technical advances also have been made. The Jacuzzi Whirlpool bath which is now indispensable for a quick recovery from minor bruises, was unknown at Queen's when Tabby first started his job.

This growing interest in sports medicine is in part a reflection of a rising tide of concern about injuries received through sport. Cases such as the injury of four high school players in one game recently in Toronto, increasingly elicit cries from concerned citizens that heavy contact supervisor at Queen's, three years as assistant trainer for Stu Langdon, and for the last thirteen years he has been head trainer. Tabby has not missed a single Golden Gaels football game since 1947 and during that time he has obviously seen a lot of changes. Although he maintains that the fundamentals of football have not be severely curbed or banned altogether. On this subject Gow is emphatic in his declaration that the majority of injuries in football or hockey result from the use of poor equipment or from lack of proper conditioning. "Actually", Tabby says, "the most common injury sustained in football is nothing more than the good old multicoloured bruise", while in hockey, the stitching of facial contusions from sticks and pucks takes up most of his time. Gow stresses that in any sport, if a player is well conditioned his chances of injury will be much diminished.

This theory was borne out in the rugger match on Saturday where an unfortunately ill-conditioned Waterloo squad lost three players, while the Queen's team escaped injury free. Tabby also points out that good conditioning means more than working hard on one area of the body. He used the example of many football players who spend their summers lifting weights but do not do enough running for their legs. This causes disproportionate upper body strength and can lead to a profusion of hamstring injuries of which there have been fifteen on the Gaels team this year.

"Actually, the most common injury sustained in football, is nothing more than the good old multicoloured bruise."

Advances in sports medicine have not all been of the admirable sort. Most football fans are familiar with tales of U.S. collegiate and professional players hyping their performances by gulping down various pills at a rate that would embarrass a Harlem junky. When questioned about this, Gow firmly stated that no such practices occur with the knowledge of the trainer in Canadian University Football. This indeed seems plausible given the less viciously competitive nature of Canadian College ball when compared with its American counterpart. However, Gow did add that it would be extremely difficult without a blood test, to tell if a player was using steroids or barbituates on his own.

Tabby Gow, then, has a lot more to do with the success of Queen's University athletic teams than most people realize. He indirectly summed up his own abilities best when he mentioned that the new sports medicine clinic would be used mainly to improve care for the student body involved only in intramural sports. This is certainly true as the varsity teams are already superbly taken care of by Mr. L.A. "Tabby" Gow.

Gaels optimistic despite injuries

by Tim Turnbull

The Golden Gaels football team, after a stirring victory over the McGill Redmen by a 27-17 score, are far from safe in their march to the OQIFC Eastern division title, Coach Doug Hargreaves said in an interview earlier this week.

"The outcome was pleasing to everyone in terms of the win-loss column. We're really unhappy with the injury problem related to the artificial turf. Three players from each team suffered non-contact injuries to the knee or ankle."

"In Rutka's case, you're talking five weeks if he comes back. We've put him in a cast to stabilize the torn ligament. If it does heal, he'll need a couple of weeks in a cast, then a week of physiotherapy. We'd have to be playing in the Atlantic Bowl before he would be ready to return."

by Mark Pentland

Three championships were claimed last week as the Bews season got off to a booming start. The Monsterball tournament had an exciting finish with Commerce 79 and PHE battling in the final match. Commerce 79 did not have a goal scored on them in four games, including the final. Yet PHE won the championship, by virtue of deeper penetration of field position, in the overtime period.

PHE shared the golf championship this year, with MBA matching their team total. Civil-Math was a close second in the tournament which saw sixty-nine players compete. Rick Aikman (PHE) walked away with the individual championship with a scintillating seventy for the round.

Following Tuesday night's Bews Relays Meds was able to capture the combined Track and Field Relays championship. Meds won three of the six relays and set records in all three. Bob McCormack spearheaded the team and led the Docs to the championship.

Hockey and Paddleball start next Tuesday, October 10th. Commerce 79 will attempt to retain the title in hockey. However, pre-season indications are that Meds will add that championship to their list.

The Harrier will be run Tuesday, October 10th at West Campus. The two and one-half mile event is one in which participants can crawl, walk, jog or run to the finish, providing they do so in 28 minutes or less. It is hoped that last year's record total of five hundred and twenty participants will be bettered.

"Blaine Shore will have a cast on his ankle for a week to ten days. Luckily, it was not his kicking foot that had ligament damage."

"It was a very physical game, which is what we predicted. Bob O'Doherty played with a broken hand suffered the week before, but still caught the three passes thrown in his area. Ted Tyczka played with a broken finger. Other than that, we were alright."

The Gaels had difficulty moving the ball against the hard-hitting McGill defence in the first half. Hargreaves attributed this to mistakes in the game plan. After organising different blocking assignments last week, the offensive line went back to their original blocking style, with better results.

"We're trying to get the ball to Marinucci more often, but other teams have shut off the inside. Until we were able to establish the quick pitch and sweep to Tom McCartney and Tony Manasterky, Dave couldn't find room. That, combined with our change in blocking style, enabled Dave to break loose in the second half."

Hargreaves was particularly surprised with the flea-flicker pass and run play that O'Doherty and Manasterky executed in the first half. "That's not part of the playbook. The pass pattern is, but the lateral to Manasterky was either made up in practice or on the spur of the moment. It reveals the outstanding athletic ability of these two players."

"The game plan defensively was to make them run wide since Barbeau and Geoghegan were good cutback runners, so we tried to string them out. Eventually we shut off their sweep and cut off their primary receivers."

"We didn't think that the McGill offence was dangerous from a structural point of view. We were more worried about containing the kick and punt return units and generating some yards on our own."

The Coach is fairly modest about his own contribution to the offence

- 5th PRIZE ($100) #649

All winners will be contacted by phone. Thanks for your support.

once the game begins. "I talk to the quarterbacks behind the bench between series, then let them run the team on the field. I called the first two plays for Bob Mullen when he subbed for Jim Rutka. We had to punt. He called the remaining plays and produced good results."

Tonight, the Gaels meet the Ottawa Gee Gees in Ottawa. Hargreaves is worried that the Gaels may play down to the level of the less-experienced Gee Gees. "I know that Ottawa will be up for the game. Everybody shoots the works for the top team."

The Coach admitted that he had thought of the Atlantic Bowl "a bit", but would not be drawn into a prediction. He was pleased that Acadia was beaten by St. Francis Xavier, rating it the biggest upset of last week's play.

Once again, the entire game will be carried live on CFRC, 1490 AM, starting at 8pm tonight.

Queen's Rowers impress

by Chris McCormack

The Queen's Rowing Gaels scored an upset victory in last weekend's regatta at Trent University in Peterborough, as the men's Varsity crew edged the University of Western Ontario by six seconds en route to a record-shattering time of 13:54, a full thirty seconds faster than the old mark.

The Gaels made a strong impression as rowers to be reckoned with at the Intercollegiate Championships in November with strong performances by all crews. The women's Varsity crew lost narrowly to Western by a margin of only seven seconds, and the Junior Varsity and Novice crews placed fourth and seventh in the competition against teams from Ontario universities and rowing clubs.

The Gaels' success in the Peterborough regatta has bolstered their confidence, and such a strong showing so early in the season serves notice to the other university teams that the new Queen's club has arrived on the rowing scene, and is a force to be reckoned with in upcoming regattas.

Court authority must be limited

The election of members of the committee to review the AMS court permits the reopening of certain questions regarding its proper role and purpose.

Last year in the wake of a case of alleged assault involving two Queen's students, AMS Chief Justice, Brian Newby, wrote a well-considered analysis of the role of AMS court.

He wrote: "Conventionally it is agreed that the court seeks to advance the best interest of the Alma Mater Society by serving as an impartial forum for the guilt resolution of frictions. But intimate experience with the Court reveals the suspicion of a more specific purpose. It is a popular belief that the AMS Court's function is to preserve students from the somewhat harsher consequences of the civil and criminal law courts, the length of whose arms would otherwise attach to indiscretions in behaviour. The belief is co-extensive with an understanding that at Queen's, 'we look after our own.'"

If the Court has become a vehicle for punishing transgressions of the law without subjecting them to trial before the criminal courts, it should be abolished immediately. That function, in our democratic society, is vested solely in Canada's judicial system. If it is here to solve inter-personal and person-organization disputes, then it is both justified and laudable.

There are certain areas presently under the AMS court's purview that must be brought into question. Specifically, one clause in the AMS Constitution regarding jurisdiction reads: "The Court shall exercise jurisdiction regarding damage to property and/or public disturbance which would tend to bring the AMS into disrepute." There is a serious danger that this will become a catch-all clause, just as the now absent "behaviour becoming a Queen's student" clause turned out to be.

Restructuring the AMS Court is not an easy task. In doing so, Outer Council must defer to the sole ambit of legally constituted courts in deciding on criminal matters. Further, it must recognize that students should be able to be independent of any university that claims jurisdiction over their private affairs.

University is not a private club which can maintain an extensive disciplinary system. It is a social institution, and its members are responsible to society only for their actions.

Thanks for the memories

The criticisms so apparent following the distribution of Tricolour '77 are noticeably lacking this year after the release of Tricolour '78.

In fact, quite the opposite is occurring. The response towards the new yearbook has been extremely favourable. With the use of more pictures and the elimination of unsightly white space, the technical deficiencies associated with Tricolour '77 have successfully been overcome.

But more importantly through the liberal use of pictures the feeling of life at Queen's during the past year has been captured effectively.

This year's Tricolour is what one expects a yearbook to be. By filling available space with pictures reflecting the many facets of Queen's society, it is certain that Tricolour '78 will be taken down from bookshelves for many years to come.

Faculty houses are on their way

Rob Reynolds

Commerce House became a step closer to reality last Thursday when the AMS Outer Council passed a motion allowing for the establishment of Faculty Houses at Queen's. In order to act as a safeguard against factionalization on the campus the Outer Council motion asserts that all Faculty Houses have an Open Door policy, whereby any students, regardless of faculty, could gain admission to the House.

The proposal the AMS voted on was a recommendation by the "Committee to Investigate Faculty Houses" struck last April 6. The Committee's original report was submitted on May 24, but was sent back because it did not concern itself with the possible ramifications for the John Deutsch University Centre as a meeting location on campus should Faculty Houses be developed.

Presently there are two Faculty Houses, Law House and Grad House which have restricted entry regulations. The new AMS policy on "Open Door" will not, however, be applicable to these facilities. Meds Representative Nis Giddens found this situation discriminatory and inquired, "Why should Grads and Law have special status?"

According to Andrew Davies, public relations officer for the Aesculapian Society, the Society is on record as favouring a restricted entry policy for the proposed Medical Students Faculty House. Davies noted, however, that the Society had considered admitting related disciplines such as Rehab Therapy to the proposed House.

AMS President and Law Student Dave Brown spoke against the restricted entry principle by drawing on the Law House example saying "Law House has made little or no contribution to the university."

A criticism of the concept of Faculty Houses was their potential to fractionalize the campus in the same manner that it was felt fraternities might in 1934. At that time the Senate banned all fraternities from Queen's.

Queen's Vice-President (University Affairs) Rory Cattanaach, re-introduced this notion saying that "If I were in first year I feel that I wouldn't be welcome at a (Faculty) House." The Speaker, Dave Corbett, ruled however, that a "Faculty House is in no way, shape or form a fraternity."

As a result of the AMS decision, the University will now consider renting a house to the Commerce Society and other faculties desiring accommodation. Commerce Society President Dave Court said that the Commerce House could be operating as soon as the spring and hopefully no later than next fall. The proposal adopted from the Committee holds that, "Any building currently being used for student housing may not be rented for a Faculty House."

Court noted that the House would function as "a general place to meet." He stated that the Commerce Society presently has 17 committees and limited space available to them. Indeed the House would have to function as a meeting place for the Commerce House and other such Faculty Houses will not be able to obtain liquor licences.

University Days

Why are we here?

by Julia Grunau
 "University Days" is coming to Queen's from October 16 to 19. "The purpose of University Days is to take a look at why we're here," explained Shelley Bentley, Coordinator of the event, "and make students think about it themselves." The program consists of four days of debates, discussions, and films designed to make the student aware of all the options open to him or her at Queen's, both academic and of a wider, more worldly outlook. One of the highlights will be the Yuk's-Yuk's comedy cabaret held in the Skylight Dining Room on Oct. 18, commenting on campus life in general, the fun and the problems. "We're trying to take a more humorous approach this year because we think it attracts more people," said Bentley. "The cabaret will cover many more subjects than cutbacks, for instance." Also featured are discussions on the role of women in the university, a panel discussion on "Jobs and Post-Secondary Education" with participants like William Bowden, Senior Vice-President of Crown Life Insurance Co., and a presentation of the film "The Paper Chase" for 50c admission. What will the student get out of University Days? "Stimulation on why they're here," said Bentley. "By going out to these events, people will find out some questions to ask, if not the answers."

Bacon sizzles in glory

Excellence in teaching

Staff
 A Queen's engineering professor has been judged to be one of the best in Ontario. David W. Bacon is among ten professors being awarded the province's highest honour for excellence in teaching. Nominees were chosen from eight Ontario universities. Professor Bacon, a native of Peterborough, Ontario, received his Ph.D. in Statistics from the University of Wisconsin in 1965. He has worked at Queen's since 1967 and became a full professor in 1973. He was a nominee among more than 56 other professors, and was judged for his superior work in the class, laboratory, course preparation, team teaching, audio-visual presentations and other instructional areas. Awards will be presented by the Ontario Confederation of University Faculty Associations (OCUFA) on Oct. 13 in Toronto.

Protest at Confederation Park

Staff
 A day of protest is being staged this Saturday to voice Kingston's opposition to the federal government's proposed cutbacks to the unemployment insurance system and the present high unemployment rate. Speakers from the Kingston coalition for Full Employment, the Kingston Committee of the Unemployed, Queen's Students Against Cutbacks and Unemployment, and various local unions, will meet in Confederation Park to express their views. According to a Kingston Coalition press release, the proposed changes to the unemployment insurance system will deny benefits to thousands of workers, including seasonally employed students and those just entering the work force. The rally has been endorsed by the AMS Outer Council, the Ontario Federation of Students and the QSACU.

AMS Court review

by Shelly Matson

Three new members have been elected to the Committee to review the AMS Court, which meets this evening.

They are Chris Best, President of Arts '80, Gary Boyd (Law '79), and Mike Minns (Law '80). Minns was Chief Prosecutor for the Court last year.

When contacted by the Journal, Gary Boyd suggested that there are a number of things that are "right and wrong" with the Court system. Some of the penalties dispensed are disputable and will require alteration, he says, claiming that "the Court shouldn't attempt to impose fines."

He added that "the Court shouldn't handle matters which are clearly criminal." Students might recall last year's case of a fourth-year engineer who allegedly assaulted a female student at a football game. Because the student escaped penalty, some critics have pointed to the incident as reflecting the inadequacies of the Court system.

Gary thought that the committee would probably have to go back to the Constitution of the AMS and that they would also see what the Senate might suggest. "Some common sense is required," he added. The other new committee members were unavailable for comment.

Toga? Et tu, Brute?

by Kim Fennell & Julius Caesar

The latest social phenomenon to hit North American campuses blessed Queen's University Wednesday night, October 4. Mechanical Engineering sponsored a Toga party and virtually all patrons came dressed appropriately.

The movie Animal House, starring John Belushi, has clearly inspired students to seek a new form of entertainment. Men and women arrived at Clark Hall clad only in bedsheets and leafed crowns. Styles varied from basic white to more artistic forms such as floral prints and national flags. One toga enthusiast was seen flaunting ocean waves around his body. Women's outfits were remarkably risqué and the abundance of bare legs was a refreshing sight. Togas were complemented by such ornaments as sunglasses, swords, helmets, construction boots and sneakers.

By 10:00pm there were already 60 toga freaks and approximately 90% were in Roman garb. By 11:30pm Clark Coliseum was filled to capacity and togas crowded the dance floor. When asked why they came to a smoker dressed in such manner, a well-educated group replied, "Toga, Toga, Toga."

Express for students

by Julia Grunau

Recently appointed Manager of the Tricolour Express, Charles Pennock, says that one of his primary concerns is "making sure that the operation is running smoothly."

Pennock is aware of problems with the buses; for instance, the departure times being late on the return to Kingston. He stated, "If there have been any mixups they will be straightened out right away." Pennock is optimistic about expanded routes and price decreases. "We're going to investigate an Ottawa route if there's a demand for it. If I show a healthy profit from the operation, then it will return to the student in the form of price reductions. After all, it is, a student service."

CAREERS IN SALES MANAGEMENT

Back to school. Exams. Christmas. More classes, more exams and graduation. And next...

Right now you are probably thinking about the past several years and what you have to look forward to after graduation.

While you're at it, consider the personal growth and satisfactions you could experience at Procter & Gamble — a leader in the consumer products industry. We regard training and development as our most basic responsibility because we promote strictly from within Procter & Gamble. We know of no way to train people to become managers other than to have them learn by doing.

Economics, history, psychology — our managers include diverse backgrounds. More important than your specific field of study are such basics as intelligence, leadership ability, innovativeness, and a solid track record of achievement.

Representatives from Sales are on campus to answer your questions and talk about their experiences at Procter & Gamble. Available today:

Our language is under siege

by Scott Haig

"Today our language is under siege and we should all regret it." This was the message Kenneth Bagnell, prominent Canadian journalist and editor, delivered Wednesday, October 4, as he spoke in Dupuis auditorium.

Mr. Bagnell lamented the increasing use of meaningless, pompous-sounding words and phrases, which only confuse the listener, and hide the incompetence, linguistic or otherwise, of the speaker. For whatever reason, said Mr. Bagnell, whether from sheer indifference, a desire to obscure the true facts, or to make themselves sound more impressive, too many speakers and writers of English today are using a convoluted discourse which is not only difficult to understand, but also tedious, dreary, and degrading.

Mr. Bagnell cited the fields of business, social science, journalism, and religion as major culprits in this propagation of jargon. Social science, he said, may emerge as the champion of this kind of suffocating language.

Mr. Bagnell gave his audience a number of amusing examples of the kind of palaver to which he was referring. He read the gathering of plain-speech enthusiasts the following sentence: "If a growth opportunity is viable enough, and shows a consistent impetus toward upward potential, things may move at an accelerated rate, aiding overall capabilities and predictability enhancement each of which, of course, should be sophisticated through head office in a concerted effort at optimum results that will be the components and configurations that indicate innovative leadership that stimulates burgeoning profits for a corporate entity that impacts creatively on the milieu and penetrates the target area in a time frame that will precipitate the facilitation of process equipment capacity with a maximum of throughput, which in turn will motivate the management team to new high retention capacities and even process rate development."

The speaker had high praise for New Yorker magazine; an example, he said, of a publication with high standards of literacy in an era of disturbing laxity. He also remarked that three of the New Yorker's former writers, John Chancellor, David Brinkley, and Harry Reasoner were among the few American broadcasters who speak clearly and precisely without obfuscation.

Mr. Bagnell is well qualified to speak on the correct use of the English language. He has been on the editorial boards of both the Toronto Star and the Globe and Mail, and is a former editor of the Globe magazine, and the United Church Observer. He collection is both representative and comprehensive. "It is an invaluable teaching and research tool for the university and Eastern Ontario."

This fall Mr. Morris, an assistant professor of film, is using the collection to teach a course called the Forgotten Years — a look at the NFB in the time immediately following 1945. Since the collection offers a portrait of Canadian society over 40 years, Prof. Morris recommends it to teachers of Canadian history, sociology, politics, art and film.

The film studies department has also received a grant from the Chancellor Richardson Memorial Fund to provide for the purchase of important early films which the NFB is unable to donate to Queen's.

Prof. Peter Morris, who made the arrangements with the NFB, says the

by Susan Mackenzie

Budding writers could win $1,000 in a literary competition sponsored by University College, University of Toronto. The competition is funded by the Norma Epstein Foundation and is open to undergraduate and graduate students of all Canadian Universities.

Entries for the contest may be either a long poem or group of poems, a full length play or group of shorter plays, a novel or collection of short stories.

Creative writers interested in the contest may obtain entry forms from the Registrar, University College, University of Toronto. Entries for the award must be submitted by May 15, 1979.

Judges, appointed by University College will announce the winner in November 1979. There is one catch to the contest however, if the judges feel no entry merits the award, no award will be given.

Ontario's universities cut back

by Beth McKenzie

Cutbacks in government expenditure on post-secondary education are forcing universities and community colleges across the province to cut out programs, reduce course options and increase the size of classes in order to meet with their reduced budgets, according to a recent Globe and Mail article.

Algonquin College in Ottawa has had to slash its budget by $1.2 million, resulting in the elimination of its three-year physics technology and community development programs, the cancellation of a photography course, and of many of the optional courses which it had offered in its business department.

Despite the extent of these cuts, Algonquin president Laurent Isabelle stated, "We won't see the savings for another two or three years. Next year's budget will be slashed by another $2 million.

At Fanshawe College in London, eleven full-time faculty posts, six of them in adult training programs, and part-time jobs equivalent to 18 full-time positions are scheduled to be terminated in order to meet with the reduction of $223,000 in this year's budget. Harry Rawson, vice-president of physical resources at Fanshawe said, "Certainly the long-term implication for the Government's increase in our operating budgets won't be keeping pace with inflation. It looks like the grants will be kept to 4 percent this year. You can't provide the same level of quality with that."

Universities are trying to cope with budget cuts by offering fewer sections per course, consequently increasing the number of students per class. With larger classes, students do not receive as much individual attention from the staff, and written work is more likely to be read by a teaching assistant than by a professor.

A document prepared by the Student's Council at the University of Western Ontario revealed that the 1974-75 reserve funds of $4 million have now dwindled to $1.5 million, as the university tried to compensate for the decreases in government funding. Due to the budget restraints, Western has eliminated two honour French courses and seen a 70 percent increase in workloads for French professors. There is a shortage of classroom equipment for engineering students, and no money to buy new equipment for the computer science department.

There are no funds available to replace the existing equipment in the physics department, which has an approximate life expectancy of no more than two years.

York University has been severely affected by the cutbacks, the story said. 30 to 40 of the courses which had been planned for this fall have been cancelled, including eight courses in the department of fine arts alone. Some courses in political science, sociology, general education and French have been dropped from the curriculum at York's Glendon campus. Principal David McQueen said that he did not know just how many courses had been eliminated.

Ian Drummond, chairman of the political economy department at the University of Toronto's main campus, said his department is offering, "at least 10 classes less in some courses and is certainly not offering all the courses listed in the calendar. Because there is no money in the budget to hire more faculty, the number of sections in introductory economics and advanced foreign policy have been reduced."

Down go coffee prices

Susan Mackenzie

Coffee drinkers will be pleased to hear that the McLaughlin Pub has dropped their coffee prices from 65c per cup to a more reasonable 40c per cup.

A.M.S. sources indicate that the original price was necessary to keep the McLaughlin Room open with its limited seating facilities. The 65c was a means of encouraging people not to sit and drink coffee all day.

To the surprise of the A.M.S. the McLaughlin Room broke even this September for the first time. As a result, coffee prices dropped to 40c, and the coffee house atmosphere of the quiet pub will be maintained.

Salamanca in Spain

Foreign University Intrigue

Having just returned from studying at the University of Salamanca for a year (Salamanca is 200 kms. Northwest of Madrid), I should like to offer some idea of what it is like to be a student in post-Franco Spain.

There are few government grants or scholarships to aim for; indeed, the financial situation of the educational system in Spain is so bleak that the government was not sure whether the universities could be opened this year. Students do not usually pay their own expenses, unless they have managed to work outside Spain (usually Germany, Switzerland or France), as summer jobs in Spain are not easily found. This does not mean, however, that admission to university is class-oriented, for the tuition cost is well within the reach of most working-class families.

The academic year runs from the end of October to June, with three weeks off over Christmas and two weeks' holidays for Easter (a very important celebration in Spain). This does not include any time lost for closure due to student protests or teacher strikes, which amounted to four months' unexpected holiday in 1977. A B.A. program there lasts 5 years.

The classroom situation is not overly inspiring. One wades into a smoke-filled classroom of up to 120 students, not many of whom are particularly interested by the dictatorial-style lectures. (There are small classes in some courses, such as Classics). There is more class participation in the upper "cycles", but it is not along our seminar lines.

A self-study approach is not stressed. Only the graduating students seem to apply themselves consistently throughout the year, but still to a lesser degree than I would say most Queen's students do. There is a great emphasis placed on the final exam, as it is the only actual assessment of the students, so mad cramming begins two or three weeks before exams.

As students do not devote an excess amount of time to books, extracurricular activities come to be very important. Students often spent the afternoon strolling with friends or philosophizing over coffee, and most evenings include an expedition to favourite bars for a few glasses of wine. In Salamanca there were no organized clubs and no sports facilities (except for the inevitable soccer fields) so activities had to be very people-oriented.

Clearly the academic side of a Spanish student's existence is far from ideal, and the students are the first to recognize this. They have been relatively unsuccessful in getting the government to reform the educational system, but apparent impotence does not discourage political activism. In fact, it is impossible to talk of a Spanish student without mentioning politics, for their whole life has been spent in a suppressed atmosphere of political discontent.

Outwardly, "student politics" seem to be given priority. There is quick reaction to injustices dealt to students elsewhere in Spain. Anything from cutbacks in accepted enrolment, to the death of a fellow student during a demonstration will immediately prove their deep sense of solidarity.

Underlying the student politics, there exists an intense interest in national politics. Students (as everywhere) feel that political restructuring should be of a more revolutionary nature. There seems to be a general disillusionment with the fact that the composition of the government has not changed much since Franco's death, although liberalizing steps have been "proposed".

Class time is not devoted to politics. In fact, my contemporary history course omitted discussion of the Civil War, as the francoist professor was reluctant to incite student oppositions. However, informal debates among friends often centre around politics.

The student's position is a respected one in a society with which he does not interrelate. As in Canada, however, the student in Spain is forced to wonder where his studies will lead him, as the job market in many fields is not expanding rapidly enough to absorb the increasing number of graduates. To be a student there is to combine the idealism of expecting radical political and social reform with the realism of an unimaginative educational system and dismal prospects for future self-fulfillment.

Pub ID — yet another card

The Editor,

Upon returning to school this fall, we were all greeted with an announcement from the Queen's Pub management that students will soon be required to present an Age of Majority Card at the door in order to gain admission to the Underground. I can understand the decision to require some proof of age. Is it necessary though, to use this particular identity card exclusively? It seems ridiculous for me to give the Ontario Government $2.00 and a quick look at the plastic-coated Birth Certificate card which they sold to me for $10.00 a few years ago, so they can issue yet another plastic-coated card! My wallet is already awash with cards identifying me as a Queen's student, an OHIP client, an Ontario driver, Blood Donor, Loblaw's shopper etc. I don't want any more plastic-coated cards!

If it's a picture they want, I will be pleased to send the Pub manager an autographed 8" x 10" glossy print of my graduation photo. Will that do instead?

Strikes hurt innocent

by Drew Fagan

The strike by non-teaching staff at York University is still another reminder of the damage that is inflicted by strikes in the public sector. Although the two disputing parties (the university itself and the workers) have certainly suffered throughout the strike in terms of lost services and pay, the major victims have been the students, the third party who find themselves without classes.

In recent months, strikes in the public sector have become far more prevalent. In areas where labour negotiations have a history of being exercises in futility, such as the Post Office and Air Canada, recent experiences have shown that the relationship between management and labour has not grown any less volatile.

The issue to be resolved is not whether management or labour is to blame for this intolerable situation. The question to be answered at this time is whether the Canadian public should be the ultimate victims of these disputes.

In failed negotiations that take place in the private sector, the effects of such a dispute remain limited to the company and the union. This mutual economic pressure, it is hypothesized, forces the parties to reach agreement on the outstanding issues, as it is in their interests to do so. The public remains untouched outside the process.

In the public sector however, a work stoppage means that the entire industry is shut. In cases such as the Post Office and the Toronto Transit Commission, a strike or lock-out forces the public to do completely without important services. In effect, in areas of government operation monopoly situations exist, and as such, labour disputes affect the general public.

The law provides that in essential services operated by the public sector, strikes are prohibited. For example, in labour negotiations that involve policemen and firemen, where agreement cannot be reached through collective bargaining compulsory arbitration is substituted for the right to strike or lock-out. Due to the great damage that would be inflicted on society if police or fire services were not available, it has been concluded that a strike situation cannot be allowed to arise. It is accepted that the rights of the public must be safeguarded in preference to the bargaining rights of individual unions.

In recent years, however, it has become increasingly obvious that the right to strike in other essential services, must be revoked in deference to the need of the public to receive these services. Certainly the ability of postal workers to virtually stop Canadian business through the use of strike action is a situation that borders on anarchy.

Individual groups cannot be given the power to act in a manner that does damage to society as a whole, as such, it is intolerable that third parties, such as the students of York University, must be the ultimate victims of the inability of bargaining parties to reach agreement. The right to strike or lock-out in the public sector must be abolished and replaced with a form of independent compulsory arbitration that will provide the disputing parties with their right to equitable agreement, but also ensure that the public receive the services that are necessary and to which they are entitled.

CFRC defence — music for all

The Editor,

Queen's radio, CFRC, is one of the oldest stations in Canada. When do they play rock? Or folk? If you're an avid listener you'll know that it changes at scheduled times during the day. You can easily find out the times by phoning the radio station at 547-6677, or by writing to radio station CFRC, and asking to have a program guide mailed to you.

The point is that CFRC has made a commendable commitment to a variety of programming in the interest of listener service. The listeners get the benefit of being able to listen to Beethoven on "Classics by Request" Sunday at noon, stories on "Bookends" the same day at 3:00pm, and the Rolling Stones on "Noc-turne" at 10:00pm.

CFRC has aimed its sights at the listening audience at large in Kingston; all musical tastes are catered to, except Country and Western. The beauty of it is that although some people enjoy and understand a limited range of music, most tend to enjoy having their musical horizons broadened.

Kingston stations cover a narrow band with CKWS, CKLC and CFMK transmitting endless hours of pops, MOR and Country and Western. With CFRC the whole range of classics, rock, folk, MOR, jazz, and pops is broadcast.

Students generally enjoy a broad range of music, something that is perfectly evident from the packed houses at Bitter Grounds, QEA concerts, Queen's University Performing Arts Office concerts, The Underground, Gallery Victoria, and Ban Righ Firesides. Fortunately this diversity of tastes is catered to by CFRC. This, I think, is an excellent way to run a university radio station.

Your Kingston, your election

The Editor:

As many of you are no doubt aware, Kingston will be holding its municipal election on November 13, 1978. What many don't realize, however, is that Queen's students, as residents of Kingston, are eligible to vote in this election.

While many don't pay much attention to what goes on outside the student "ghetto", the student community forms a very large (approximately 10,000 of a city of 70,000) and potentially very vocal portion of the electorate. In light of recent events involving the city and Queen's students, this election provides everyone with an excellent opportunity to voice their opinions on matters of importance to both the city and the students.

In order to facilitate such an event, an on-campus candidates' meeting is being planned for either late October or early November. It is hoped that all the candidates for each of the positions available will take advantage of this occasion to talk to the audience about their concerns for the city.

Kingston is not only the place that we come to for an education, but is also the place we call home at least eight months of the year. Given the size of the student community, it would seem wasteful to miss utilizing such an opportunity as this election to take part in the local political process. When the voting list comes out in your area, check and make sure that your name is on it. You may even consider running for office yourself.

The Queen's student body is an important part of the Kingston community. Let's show that we are aware of our importance by taking part in this year's municipal elections.

Good listening!

The Editor:

It has been bad enough that, for the past year, the Journal has made it a policy to not print any article dealing however remotely with CFRC (with the exception of the last referendum debate), but Chris Copp's column in the issue of 6 October 1978 is a step too far.

For Copp to assert that the student Boyd's tastes in programming (ignoring those of the listeners outside of this closed group) are identical to his own is simply errant. To use his position at the Journal to publicly condemn CFRC for not catering to his personal entertainment demands, to the exclusion of others, is nothing short of imprudent, insulting, and unjust. Most students are unaware that CFRC's broadcast hours are limited because the transmitters interfere with the electrical engineering labs. Because of our time sharing arrangement, we must condense our programming to fit within the limited hours available to us. As a result, we cannot devote as much time as we (and Mr. Copp) would like to any particular music area.

If the listeners have difficulty finding the programmes they seek, they need only consult a Programme Guide, supplied free of charge to anyone who asks for it, or they can consult the Whig-Standard for a weekly detailed list of our FM programming. At least one newspaper in this city sees fit to inform their readership of the entertainment available to them.

After reading Mr. Copp's article it is obvious that the reader's quest for informative, accurate, and responsible journalism is a hit and miss affair in the Queen's Journal, and after a few misses another reader bites the dust.

Humanity sought in successor

The Editor:

Now that the body of Albino Luciani has been laid to rest in a crypt in St. Peter's, the attention of the world can turn to the College of Cardinals. With his body of Church Princes rests the task of choosing one from amongst them who will have to shoulder the responsibilities that Pope John Paul did not have time to assume.

One thing, however, is certain. The new man, whoever he may be, will reflect the impact that Pope John Paul made on the papacy in the month that he was the Shepherd of the world's Roman Catholics. Those who think that this Conclave will be a mere carbon copy of the last one, so recently adjourned, have failed to understand how much has changed in thirty-four days. In August, the Cardinals had to decide whether to choose a man in the mould of something more concrete to go by in casting their ballots.

Pope John Paul broke the ice; his successor cannot help but swim in the newly-opened waters. How far he is able to swim depends on how willing he is to proceed with the changes that John Paul initiated. The Cardinals have surely recognized, as has Archbishop Emmet Carter of Toronto, that John Paul's humanity and humanness have made an impact on the world, not only on Catholics but on all peoples. The eyes of the world are now focused on Rome to see if the Conclave can produce a second miracle.

University Days — chance to assess your education

On Tuesday October 17; to Thursday Oct. 19, the Education Commission of the Alma Mater Society will once again sponsor University Days. University Days is a time of introspection, when we all can take a brief moment to ponder the future of University Education. There will be forums where all sorts of opinions will be expressed on our university system.

The Credibility of University is a topic which has become the subject of some very heated debate recently. The credibility of University is no longer a topic for moot perusal amongst ourselves. For this reason, the panel discussion on the Credibility of the University will be the highlight of University Day. The panel will feature Lionel Rubinoff, noted Philosopher and author, joined by David Cooke, the NDP education critic.

Principal Watts will be a participant, as will Dr. Robert Pike, Chairman of the Sociology department at Queen's, and an acknowledged expert in the field of accessibility to post-secondary education. The panel discussion will be chaired by Moe Choclea, Rector of Queen's. At the conclusion of the discussion, there will be an open reception, where all students may ask questions, and speak with our guests.

On a lighter note, the University Day committee will be presenting the Cutbacks Cabaret, a humorous look at the present shortfall in government spending. This revue, featuring songs, mock interviews, and political satire, was well received at Carleton University. This troupe works out of a Toronto club which gives young comedians an opportunity to demonstrate their talents in a professional setting.

The University Day will open on Monday, Oct. 16th with an address titled, "The State of the University". This will give everyone a good chance to hear Principal Watts evaluate the present situation at Queen's and the prospects for the future.

Another panel discussion will deal with the resolution that "a student is far better off studying art history than politics, business, or engineering". It is fairly obvious that there will be mixed opinions on this resolution. The panel includes Prof. Morand (art history), Prof. Meisel (politics), Prof. Jackson, (school of business), and

Prof. Brown (engineering).

Of concern to us all is the prospect of finding some sort of employment upon completing University. Dean Sinclair, Miriam Edelson from the OFS, Francois Couture, and William Bowden will approach the issue of "Jobs and Post secondary Education". Miriam Edelson is the Chairperson of the Ontario Federation of Students. Francois Couture represents L'ANEQ, the student organization in Quebec. Mr. Bowden is a Senior Vice President of the Crown Life Insurance Company.

Interspersed throughout the three days will be films, debates, and social activities.

It is generally acknowledged that the post secondary education system is at a cross roads. University day is an excellent opportunity to evaluate our strengths and short fallings, and to try and get a sense of direction for the future. Watch the JOURNAL for the times and locations of events.

the Good Shepherd (John XXIII) or in the mould of the Great Teacher (Paul VI). With almost extraordinary perception, they opted for a rare blend of the two. John Paul emerged as the ideal Pope for these times. His reign has radically changed the criteria for selecting a successor. Now, the Cardinals will have to find one who is like him. Now, they have

IF YOU CARE ABOUT THE COMPANY YOU KEEP ...THINK ABOUT A CAREER WITH XEROX OF CANADA

We're planning to visit your campus at least twice.

- First, we invite you to attend a Briefing Session which will:
  - provide you with information about Xerox of Canada and the careers we offer
  - give you the opportunity first, to ask, and receive answers to, any and all questions you may have
  - second, to decide whether or not your future might be with us.
- We recommend that you attend the briefing session before signing up for a personal interview.
- Plan to join us! We look forward to meeting you.
- The Xerox of Canada people are coming to campus and your Placement Officer has full details.

Volunteers abroad

crossroads

Canadian Crossroads International (CCI) is a federally chartered, private charitable organization working to foster international co-operation and intercultural understanding by offering suitable volunteers the opportunity to live and work as volunteers in developing countries of the Third World.

Chartered in 1968, CCI is a non-denominational, largely volunteer organization which receives funds from Canadian International Development Agency, other donors, and the fund-raising activities of participants. The continued existence of CCI is dependent on the active involvement of returned volunteers and some commitment to this end is expected.

This year over 90 Canadians will have gone to Africa, the Indian sub-continent, the West Indies and South America, while some 21 people from these areas will have come to Canada. Applicants to CCI must be 19 years or over and have Canadian citizenship or landed immigrant status. Participants are chosen on the basis of maturity, social awareness, past experience, motivation, and interest and commitment to improving public awareness of development issues.

Placements are for roughly 4 months, usually running from May to September, and September to January. If you are interested, contact Ian 542-1621, Gary or Sue 549-6054, or Frank 549-4763.

by Ian Anderson
(Crossroads volunteer 1978)
What I want to do is to describe briefly how I think going overseas with CCI differs from going over on your own.

The first thing you are not is a tourist. The duration of your stay is much longer and you don't have nearly as much money to spend. Most tourists, it seems to me only come in "contact" with the people of the country when they are travelling from one luxury hotel to another, and usually this is accomplished by "Deluxe Bus" or hired car. They are so busy trying to cling to symbols of western affluence that their appraisal of the country they are in is limited to its capacity to meet these demands. The inevitable conclusion which they reach is that the country is very poor and an incredible mess.

It is not just that a tourist never adjusts to the new environment, but that he or she never experiences that environment. It took me a good solid month to begin to feel really comfortable in Sri Lanka: to the noise, dirt, the (by our standards) overcrowding, the food, the heat, the "poverty".

The second thing you are not is a 'traveller'. A traveller is a particular genre of tourist, typified by less funds but much more time than the average tourist. Unlike tourists, travellers do more frequently come in contact with the people and they generally spend enough time in the country to become adjusted.

Unfortunately travellers seldom get to know the people of the country. What interaction they have is with shopkeepers and guest houses and with others who have enough money and time to relax on the beaches and travel about.

This is all very well and in my opinion is more fruitful than the tourist made of "experiencing" a country, but it still fails to provide the kind of vehicle for getting to know the average people of the country.

The root to this problem as I see it is the incredible disparity in wealth. The tourists are so wealthy that they never bother to associate with the people. The travellers on the other hand, while they may be poor by western standards are still incredibly rich by local standards.

Even if unlike the tourists they do not flaunt their wealth and may indeed live quite frugally, their very presence is sufficient notice of their wealth: the cost of an airplane ticket to the country of even the capacity to take time off to visit other countries are beyond the reach of all but the wealthy elite in the country.

The behaviour of travellers who try to go native end up wearing an odd assortment of garment, rather than helping to bridge the gap, only widens it. In my experience virtually all of the Ceylonese people I talked to found this mildly insulting. Sri Lanka is not Canada where it is now chic to dress down; it's not even a social statement because you're in the wrong society.

The value of CCI for me was that it gave me a means of meeting the ordinary people of Sri Lanka. I was placed with a rural development organization called Sarvodaya Sivramadana which has a widespread village base and international funding.

Although I came wanting and expecting to work in community development, which is my interest, I ended up doing very little. Even though in this aspect my summer was exceedingly frustrating, it did provide me with an opportunity to interact with local people in a way which most tourists and travellers never do.

I learned about the perils of international volunteerism, rigid expectations and the difficulties of rural development. I came away with a lifetime of questions, some good friends and a taste for hot curry. I encourage anyone who is interested to apply.

by Gary Berezny
(Crossroads volunteer, 1978)
At the end of May, after an attempt was made to orient me to third world life, I was catapulted into a culture so different from ours that no amount of orientation would have been sufficient.

The Mobai Clinic, Sierra Leone, West Africa, provided the setting for my Crossroads experience. As a fourth year medical student doing my elective I was faced with dealing with the treatment of numerous tropical diseases, malnourishment, tribal customs, and interference from the native medicine men. The Clinic consisted of a minimally supplied 40-bed unit founded by a native Sierra Leonean and staffed mostly by native paramedical people. Although it is presently funded entirely by overseas donations, the ultimate goal is to become self-sufficient with income from a developing oil palm plantation. Inefficiency, lack of motivation, and lack of expertise are the major hurdles to overcome before reaching the goal of self-sufficiency.

On a more personal level, the experience was one of contrasting feelings. Sometimes exciting, yet frightening and stimulating, (sometimes) exhausting. There were initial feelings of vulnerability, loneliness and a stark awareness of my whiteness in a totally black community. These were to be transformed to feelings of friendship and brotherhood in a part of the world which seems to have been isolated from the racism we know of.

In my mind is an array of images of the African way of life I came to know: the cluttered colourful markets where bartering is an acquired skill; travel was usually in a half-ton truck crowded with breast-feeding mothers, their children, goats and chickens, and life went on at such a slow pace that seldom was anyone late simply because there were no deadlines. In the smaller isolated villages which haven't changed for centuries, I saw people who by North American standards were living in extreme poverty, with staggering infant mortality rates and a lack of comforts as we know them. Yet in spite of this I saw a very happy, content people. This is unlike what I saw in the capital of Sierra Leone where foreign influence was apparent. Here poverty appeared in slums such as our own. Contentment, happiness, and self-sufficiency had disappeared. This forced me to consider the question, "Who really benefits from so-called 'development' of the third world?"

CUSO

What is CUSO?

CUSO is an independent development agency which

1. Recruits and sends skilled individuals from all walks of life to help Third World nations train their people to cope with our fast-changing, technological environment;

2. Supports-through volunteer participation, financial or material contributions (or all three)-specific development projects initiated and directed by Third World governments, groups or individuals;

3. Seeks at home, in accordance with its Development Charter, "to promote activities leading to understanding of and action on the causes of inequitable development".

Since CUSO's inception in 1961, over 6,000 Canadians have contributed to these goals as CUSO volunteers in 66 different countries.

The CUSO Charter Whereas development includes the freeing of people, not just from the constraints of poverty, hunger and disease, but also from constraints which inhibit a person's control over his destiny, the pursuit of dignity and social equality, and WHEREAS CUSO aims to participate in the global struggle for justice, equitable development and human progress, Therefore — individuals commit themselves to strive for the following:

1. to increase their awareness of the root causes of inequitable development in all countries of the world;

2. to utilize this increased awareness in programs designed to eliminate these inequities;

3. during their service overseas, by their lifestyles and work, to reflect their sensitivity and respect for the values and cultures of their hosts;

4. to recognize that involvement in the development process embraces both service overseas and action in Canada;

5. to recognize that their own country may be culpable in the continuing exploitation of one country by another;

6. to actively identify themselves with all peoples who seek to strengthen rights and responsibilities for their country's social development, consistent with the United Nations' Universal Declaration of Human Rights.

by Mark VanDusen
(CUSO volunteer 1974-76)

I worked as a CUSO volunteer from 1974-1976, teaching science in a trade school in Kasama, a small town in Zambia. My background included a bizarre B.A. (economics, chemistry, psych.) and 2 years selling widgets in Kitchener and Kingston.

Another year of selling and there was a reasonable probability of promotion to the Toronto corporate cogworks, but I found myself unsatisfied in deriving my self-esteem from encouraging pats on the head and salary following the monthly print-out which showed that sales were indeed increasing. So what? Sliding fast, I quit.

Motivations for joining CUSO, other than escaping the above travel and a vague sense of noblesse oblige. Through reading I had come to realize that in being born into middle class Canada I had health, education, mobility and expectations far beyond those of the average human being (who is not a Queen's student or even a Canadian but a peasant eking a living from a small piece of land that is owned by someone else.)

Paperwork, acceptance and orientation over, I arrive in Lusaka. The dry season is beginning, it's warm and dusty, jacarandas and flamboyants are blooming, I am tired, excited, unsure, feeling conspicuously white every time I walk out on the crowded streets.

I worked harder than I ever have, trying to make theoretical science relevant and interesting as possible to very keen student mechanics, carpenters, electricians, metal workers and bricklayers. It meant lots of study, experimentation and work with trade teachers to organize a workable program; it meant planning, inspections, supervision, 250 test papers at the middle and end of each term, quadruplicates of reports with no carbon paper; it meant frustrations over the lack of supplies, improvising, shrugging off any number of minor annoyances.

It was a time of learning through being where I was and travelling, meeting friendly and fascinating people from both Zambia and abroad. I came to respect the way of life of the rural Zambian who works very hard and does not share in much of the wealth or privilege normally accruing to those who work hard. People fit into their environment and I couldn't help thinking that here were people who would survive depressions, energy shortages and everything but wars caused by the white rulers of the world.

I left Zambia with regret for it meant leaving friends that I would probably never see again to face winter, job and apartment hunting. On returning to Canada I found out what culture shock is—a profound sense of alienation and displacement, often accompanied by depression that very few friends can help one through. It was difficult to return home feeling that I had grown substantially and had much to share only to be confronted with an extravagantly wasteful society that values the average experience but not the unique.

The lasting effects of my CUSO experience are mainly political, for I have a very different approach to power relationships and history compared to the apolitical me that arrived in Zambia. The Western World has been intimately involved in the underdevelopment process and continues to ensure that the "rich get richer and the poor get poorer." Canada is not the generous innocent it likes to appear to be, for most of our aid promotes Canadian exports, not Third World development.

My outlook often leaves me cynical particularly about the type of information that is commonly available on the Third World. A favourite is the advertisement of Pudding Cup—only a Madison Avenue cretin would believe that a peasant child labourer would earn enough picking cocoa beans to afford that kind of luxury. Perspectives change radically after exposure to more of the world.

My overall experience with CUSO was very positive and I am glad I went to Zambia, glad that I went as a volunteer. I am presently applying for a position in Papua New Guinea, once again with CUSO. I think the involvement will be a long one, the world is too interesting, the work too needed to ever sell widgets again.

another perspective

As a student in Ghana Fred Yaw Addo-Abedi was taught by a volunteer from overseas, an American in the Peace Corps. He is now a student at Queen's and has offered to answer some questions about how CUSO, and other agencies, appear to people in the Third World.

Are Canadian volunteers taking jobs from the local people?
No, I don't think they are because I believe that in a lot of Third World Countries there will be space for expatriates for awhile especially in sciences and technology. There are not enough personnel in these fields in Third World countries especially at the present rate of growth. So it is not a question of taking jobs away from the local people. Volunteers act as a supplement to the resources already available.

Is the sending of volunteers a subtle form of imperialism - another way to spread Western values?
It would be very difficult for anyone to impose their values on people in Ghana with the present state of consciousness there. I think that in other places this is true as well.

What did you gain from your contact with the volunteer from the Peace Corps?
It was one way to be introduced to other social norms and other cultures. After class we had the opportunity to talk to the volunteer and ask him about the United States. A lot of young kids get the impression from the movies that everyone from America is rich—that they all get a Mustang for their 16th birthday. By meeting someone from the States you get a more realistic perspective.

Are these agencies simply a way of dumping our unemployed on the Third World?
Not really, because as I pointed out earlier there are still opportunities for people in the technical fields and the sciences. It could be looked upon as of mutual benefit for both countries.

On the other hand it is on such small scale that it wouldn't be right for Canadians to stress that they are giving aid to the Third World countries. Because of the small number of volunteers the country can accommodate (the aid) is of limited value.

It's not unusual.
We humans are prone to fickleness and failure. Just when it seems you can really trust someone—blatant—your distrusts that trust all away again.
There are exceptions to that observation, however. For all acquaintances are "old friends" friends. The toughness of a few serve as an acknowledgment to us.
There are some people who do foolish things when they feel betrayed and their confidence is shaken—like control issues, run away or become cynical.
There's a better alternative. We know someone who loves with an everlasting love. He actually becomes closer than a brother. Don't give up until you give him a chance with your life.
We can arrange a introduction.

The Difference...

We at Dimension Stereo pre-select the best values in stereo equipment and then put together well balanced combinations for maximum system performance. Our $685 system is a good example. The speaker system is so important that we have selected the new Advent 1. It uses the same woofer and tweeter as the famous large Advent but in a smaller enclosure. It sounds very similar but bass output at ultra-low frequencies is slightly less. Its great sound has made it a best seller over night.

The receiver is a remarkable achievement by SONY. The model STR-V2 produces 25 watts per channel at a price where others produce 15. We feel that this is the outstanding buy of the season.

We have added the popular TAYA CP250 auto-shut-off turntable for its high performance, attractive appearance and moderate cost.

At only $685, this system provides a big, room-filling sound that is warm and clear.

In addition, our approach to customer support is unique. Our staff are trained in both technical and sales areas. Our service people are sales people. Our $25,000 test lab is used to check and adjust every unit sold so that it works better when it leaves our store. We provide real 5 year warranties and repairs are done on our premises by our staff under our control. So service is effective, and fast.

... it makes the difference.

Primary English Class a comic success

Stereotypes a source of laughter

Teacher and pupils help their Italian classmate to "sit down".

by Julian Cunningham

Racism is a dirty word, right? There is nothing funny about people who say "Frog" as opposed to Frenchman, or "Wop" or "Chink"—especially "Polack"—nothing funny at all, is there? Could you laugh at someone who walked up to a little old (Chinese) lady and said, "Why don't you take an eggroll and shove it possibilities of such an incredible situation

Director Ray Whelan offered us the stereotypical characters we normally associate with certain races; the macho Italian, the suave Frenchman and the Polish janitor. The stereotypes are essential in this context, and must supercede individuality for theme's sake.

If the answer is no, you should avoid The Primary English Class like the plague, because like me, several hundred other people chortled their way through two hours of blatant racism and ethnic insensitivity last Tuesday night.

The Primary English Class stereotypically depicts the misunderstanding and vacuous parlance that occurs between New York's diverse ethnic pockets. In microcosm, we witness a jokey version of urban racial tension that in reality, is deadly serious. Yet, we laugh. Playwrite Israel Horowitz successfully elicits a redeeming feature of mankind; his ability to laugh at himself—and why not?

Imagine a classroom in New York where five people meet to learn English. Problem: Nobody (save the teacher) speaks one word of English, and nobody speaks a common language. The Italian is horny, the German is deaf and nearly blind, and Miss Wastba, the teacher, is intent on versing these misfits in "The Great Vowel Shift" and other major developments in a language in which her students are incapable of so much as a "hello" or "which way to the john?"

The Open Circle Theatre brilliantly explored the inherent comic

It is unfortunate that the cast forgot at times the necessity of keeping the play light. The heavy subversive themes are easily extracted from the situation, and a sort of Chaplinesque bittersweetness is what they correctly aimed at in the beginning. Subsequently however, certain moments were weighted, introspective and sentimentalized, particularly by Christine Moynihan as Wastba in her oratory on how she was raped, to an uncomprehending audience of ethnic misfits.

The class cannot "stick together" as Wastba had hoped, and everyone leaves until only she and the Italian remain. Her last-ditch effort to communicate falters, but eventually succeeds. Of his own free will, the Italian blurts out, "I cannot touch the light." This is the negative Miss Wastba has been praying for—her measure of success that night.

The symbolism, like the final scene itself, is simple and funny. Yet there is a quiet wistfulness, a small tug at your heart, like the tug you felt while watching "The Little Tramp" dejectedly toddling down a lonely road, in his silly little way, in the final scene of a silent movie.

Bravo to the marriage of tears and laughter
Bravo to The Primary English Class.

Renowned Irish performers celebrate culture in their music

by Nick Gray

For the first time Kingston will be the location for a concert produced by the Comhaltas Ceoltoiri Eireann, Ireland's premier cultural movement, when they present a group of all Ireland Champions, singers, dancers and musicians. The concert will take place at K.C.V.I. Auditorium on Wednesday, October 18th, at 8pm.

The show will feature genuine Traditional Irish music, song and dance. It will depict the real Ireland, with all its meriment, spontaneity and a tinge of sadness. The music, song and dance are of the people—the songs of love, rollicking jigs and reels, and the uninhibited native dancing. It should be noted that it will not present those commonly considered forms of Irish tradition that we are used to seeing here in North America. For example, Irish singing is considered an art and is done unaccompanied. The traditional cultural essence of Ireland does not include "The Black Velvet Band."

The performers bring with them all the talent and diversity of the native traditions, traditions which are molded at the fireside and impregnated with centuries of patriotism and experience—sorrow and joy; hope and love; expectation and disappointment. The fiddle, accordion and flute will revive memories of the Irish homeland, songs will tell of glorious deeds, and lofty aspirations, and the defiant tap of dancing feet will symbolize the Irish desire for freedom and survival.

The show will include performances on the accordion, fiddle, uilleann pipes, banjo, flute, whistle, concertina, piano, as well as, singing, dancing and narration.

This is an annual tour which takes the concert to many centers on the eastern seaboard of both the United States and Canada. Kingston is indeed fortunate to have such a fine group of artists displaying their many talents. Information and tickets are available from Mrs. Anne McConnell, Chairlady, 178-188 Ontario Street

Whittaker dazzles Kingston crowd

Monotonous he's not!

by Christiane Schull

A crowd waits anxiously the arrival of their God Soon, the Kingston Memorial Center darkens and the stage lights up in colors of pink and turquoise creating an aura into which HE will enter. Roger Whittaker soon emerges ("five minutes late" as the woman next to me cattily remarks) reaching out his hand to his audience and singing "Here I come, oh, here I come to sing a song for you... to play my song for you."

He begins his concert with a variety of songs from "Darling don't marry the Swiss Mountaineer" in which he performs a masterful yodel to some Rock and Roll "You ain't nothing but a hounddog" pointing to members of the audience as he dances across the stage. Then he sits back on his stool, casually dressed, looking like no God I've ever seen. He projects a warm, homey, "ordinary" style. The crowd is roused and clapping and begging for more. He laughs and sighs and addresses his audience. "There was another kind of music which was popular when rock and roll was riding high... and Belafonte was the king" he swaggers into a calypso. Then he sits back again and has some fun with his audience. Much of his appeal derives from the intimacy he develops with his audience. He is the story-teller, the troubadour. He is the performer and we his necessary participants. He involves us. He speaks to us, and we respond: clapping, or swaying from side to side. You feel somehow you're getting more than your money's worth.

By the end of the first half of his show, Whittaker has the audience in his control. They lap up everything he presents. It is obvious that he loves the stage and loves performance and knows full well that the audience will respond favorably to anything he does. He merges for the second half dressed like "Don Quixote" in a metal vest-like shield and riding boots and explains facetiously that his outfit was worn by "Rex Harrison who is also handsome, arrogant and talented". It is a costuming surprise which seems rather pointless and particularly self-indulgent.

Before one of his livelier and more humorous tunes called "Isabelle and Caroline", he explains that, "it is about a time when I had two girlfriends at once. Everything was fine until Isabelle met Caroline". His two female vocalists stand on either side of him and serve him as he goes through his antics "Men are basically polygamous and women are monogamous!" He bounds through a stychomythic monologue "I'm polygamous and you're monogamous, I'm polygamous and you're monogamous" and on and on until one of his female vocalists turns rather matter-a-factly and says "I think you're monotonous".

His theatrics over, he sits back on his stool and sings a rolling "Canadian song of smuggling rum in Nova Scotia" and demands the audience that to the "drum beat clap your hands". Next, he uses the reverse psychology technique on his audience saying that he's heard Canadians are shy. The audience fiercely denies it. So he asks the audience to link arms and sway, sway, sway. "Goodbye... so long... Farewell" will be his last song but if the audience wants more Whittaker says "Just shout". Naturally, the audience is not yet satiated and he is given a standing ovation at which he comes back and sings a song dedicated to the "beautiful women of Kingston" and another called "Canada is", "... a country full of love!"

The God leaves, the stage darkens, the happy subjects go home

Whittaker plays to his audience.

Rush in concert

by Staff

Rush appears in concert at the Kingston Memorial Centre on Saturday, October 14th. The three members, Alex Lifeson (guitar), Geddy Lee (bass, vocals), and Neil Peart (drummer) have produced a number of interesting albums over the last few years. Though their music is usually associated with heavy rock rhythms, since Peart joined the group they have moved steadily towards a more defined music in the telling of epic stories.

Their last few albums, "2112", "ALL THE WORLD'S A STAGE", and "A FAREWELL TO KINGS", exhibit

this style of the epic in hard rock music. The latest work "HEMISPHERES" relates in part to these earlier albums by continuing the story started in "A FAREWELL TO KINGS", (the story of "Cygnus X-1"). The up coming concert will undoubtedly combine many of their old and new works in what promises to be a stunning performance by one of the decades top recording artists.

Appearing in concert with Rush will be Ariel. A new four piece band they blend tight harmonies and layered keyboards edged with tempered guitar playing into an easy listening progressive pop sound.

Read My Lips: Tim Curry
reviewed by Julia Grunau

Read My Lips, is not for the Rocky Horror fan who expects a reprise of Curry's performance in the film "Rocky Horror Picture Show" nor is it for the acid rock addict, nor a ballad-collector. This is an album of four to six minute theatrical performances set to music—for instance, Burt Bacharach's "Anyone Who Had A Heart" is transformed from an innocuous plaint to a Covent Garden mini-symphony, while "Wake Nicodemus" has an honest to God Canadian Pipe Band (yes, bagpipes) playing throughout.

What emerges from Curry's efforts is an album that bewilders at the first hearing. Most of the songs, especially on the first side, are so odd as to make one wonder what Curry was trying to accomplish. Bob Ezrin's heavy-handed production is always evident, specifically when he modestly amplifies his own percussion playing and echo to the pain threshold (in "Brontosaurus"). However, he has at least allowed Curry's talents for the dramatic to rise to the surface like so much rich cream, and whatever the production lacks, the voice makes up for.

This is not a record for parties. It probably will not impress a date. I am not at all tempted to dance to it. But if a group of people that you have known and liked for years find themselves together with nothing to listen to, put this album on. Being your pals, they will naturally appreciate your adventurous spirit, and they themselves might be taken with the innovation and style that pervades every cut. The front cover of the album expresses all: Curry, adamant on a field of gules, the quaintness of the theatrically-trained.

My Aim is True: Elvis Costello reviewed by Brent Laviolette
Last year's model has been replaced. Elvis Costello's newest album has taken a four letter word and made it obsessive, the "beat" is relentless on This Year's Model. Production-wise the instruments have more presence. This new brightness has not, however, affected the "mass-sound" effect achieved on the first album; rather, This Year's Model possesses more energy if anything.

Unfortunately, I find This Year's Model less satisfying than Costello's groups possess the drive of Elvis Costello as a result.

Vocally, Costello hammers out a snobby Joe Cocker growl, but Elvis makes little attempt to carry a vocal line. The words are spoken more than sung; he's obviously more concerned with what he says rather than how. On his mellower tunes (musically nor lyrically speaking), such as "Allison", Mr. Costello presents a good variety on My Aim is True, ranging from the Reggae back-boned "Watching the Detectives" to "Welcome to the Working Week", a powerful rocker. Elvis' experimentation with the rock medium is complete and very successful on the album, he does what he wants to do and he does it well.

"Mystery Dance" is simply one of the greatest fast-driving rock and roll songs ever recorded; it's just the right length too, one minute and thirty-five seconds. Any longer and cerebral damage could result. No phony extended solos for these guys; it's raw, powerful rock all the way. An impressive debut album.

first effort. There is no pretense to variety on the new album, except perhaps "Little Triggers", a strangely sentimental song. The beat is never given a rest, neither are the listener's ears. The intensity of the listening experience is tailor made for party-time but lacks the variation of My Aim is True, an easier listening album.

This Year's Model defends itself from such criticism, however. The beat is addictive. "Pump it up" demands a high-volume playing; it's impossible to sit through this one. "You Belong to Me", a throwback to the Dave Clark Five era continues the beat and drives into the second side which features the outstanding cut "Radio, Radio". The rest of the songs are equally powerful.

Costello's anger provides the sustained energy that the album depends on and his hate-crazed lyrics add the perfect touch of insanity. It's hard for North American audiences to take Elvis as seriously as most of the British punks. Perhaps his own lyrics tell us why, "You're easily lead but much to scared to follow."

If you're a rocker of any kind you'll love This Year's Model, if not, leave it alone.

ME? BREAK INTO A BANK?

Like many other recent graduates, you may never have considered a career with Bank of Montreal. You may think that banking hasn't changed (or hasn't had to) since your grandfather was your age. You feel that the skills you've acquired in college or university wouldn't be needed, or used, in a career with Bank of Montreal. That's just not true anymore. The fact is, Bank of Montreal has become the leader in an innovative movement that's seen Canadian banking change more in the past ten years than it has in the past fifty. And we can offer you responsible, challenging points of entry into a dynamic business that just might go further and faster than any other in the next few years.

We need special people to keep us out in front. "Special" means people who can effectively manage and motivate others and who are always perceptive and responsive to our customers' needs. A career within our branch system provides this continual challenge and a comprehensive grounding in business and people management.

The only common denominators with people who work at Bank of Montreal these days are the characteristics that never go out of date...talent, ambition and determination.

Maybe you haven't thought about a career with the Bank of Montreal. But we hope we've got you thinking. And you're never going to know just how right breaking into a bank can be unless you ask.

We'll be on campus for interviews November 7th, 8th, & 9th. To find out more, just contact your campus placement office or write to: Employment Supervisor, Bank of Montreal, 220 Laurier, Suite 540, Ottawa, Ontario K1P 5Z9

Gael's ready to face toughest yet

by Dan MacKinnon

Last Friday night in Ottawa, the Queen's Golden Gaels took another, though somewhat unsure step, towards an undefeated, first place finish in their conference. Yet the game left more than the smell of roses in the nostrils of the Gaels' coach. Although the University of Ottawa Gee Gees surrendered 28 to 16, victims of an impressive 448 yards of offense churned out by the Gaels, the postgame reactions of the coaches seemed to tell a different story.

Doug Hargreaves, the Gaels coach, perhaps thinking about how his club would have fared against a first rate team, commented that "the only good thing about this game was that it was better than a loss."

The Ottawa U. coach, Cam Innis, an allstar lineman with the Gaels in the late 60's, was very pleased with his boys' performance. "We're a young club (18 rookies) and getting better all the time. I was really proud of them."

Ottawa U. mounted the most away with more than we should have."

With a large and vocal contingent of Queen's fans urging them on, the Gaels offense fumbled the ball to Ottawa U. on their first play from scrimmage and the Gee Gees managed a field goal as a result.

The Gaels offense started sluggishly but as the quarter wore away, Bob Mullen suddenly hit "OD" over the middle for 44 yards and a touchdown. The next time the offense got the ball they successfully mixed the pass and run and marched downfield from their own 27 to score a touchdown. O'Doherty latched onto a 15 yard Mullen strike at 12:42 of the quarter to cap the drive. Unlike the first convert, this one was unsuccessful. In the second quarter, the Gaels offense fell into a conservative shell. Eschewing the pass, McCartney and Marinucci worked hard on the ground, but the Gaels could only manage a single off a wide field goal attempt. Trailing 14 to 3, Ottawa U. went to the air, and with great success. Joel Baldwin, their wide receiver, made five consecutive catches, including a touchdown with 1 second remaining in the half. Defending the pass is not just the secondary responsibility, the front four must harry the passer. Coach Hargreaves praised the role of Ottawa's offensive line. "They shut down our potential allstars really well tonight." With only a 14 to 10 half time lead, coach Hargreaves kept his players on the field a few extra minutes so they could think about their lackluster first half showing.

Two key second half interceptions seemed to turn the game around for the Gaels. Ottawa, apparently with momentum behind them, mounted a third quarter drive that took them from their own 35 to the Gaels 7. On second and goal, free safety Ted Tyczka, deep in the end zone, leaped high in the air for an interception that snuffed out the Gee Gees' drive. On the last play of the quarter, corner linebacker John Vernon snared an off target pass, thus turning the ball over to the offense on their own 50. After two quarters with nothing but a single point to show for their efforts, a rejuvenated Gaels offense marched down field and scored. Neither a dropped pass which had touchdown written all over it, nor a touchdown run wiped out by penalty stopped the Gaels. Tony Manasterky's 26 yard run ended the drive, and the touchdown was converted to make the score 21-10 for the Gaels at 3:56 of the fourth quarter.

The next time the offense got the ball, Bob Mullen hit O'Doherty in full flight running a post pattern towards

"We let them get away with more than we should have"

will be the strongest since the college bowl winner of 1968.

Athlete of the week

This past week has not been particularly busy for Queen's sports, however those athletes who gave up their Thanksgiving weekend to carry on, fought well and were, in most cases, victorious.

The most prominent athlete this week remained at Queen's with the Soccer Gaels who played teams from McMaster (Saturday) and Brock (Sunday). His performance was powerful on both days and by scoring two out of the three goals recorded all weekend, he kept Queen's in the first place position. A skilled, supportive player and team member, the Athlete of the Week is Wally Klus.

There were two other outstanding Queen's athletes whose impressive performances should be noted. In Pennsylvania, Adam Shoemaker placed in the top ten runners of the meet. This lists him among the best college runners in North America.

Travelling with Queen's to the University of Western Ontario, wing forward, Don Cameron, played hard and exhibited commendable form throughout the Rugby Gaels' first team match. Unfortunately, it ended early for him when the ligaments of his left knee twisted. He is recovering in a soft cast.

O'Doherty suffered broken hand; still managed two touchdowns

Gaels inconsistent at times but still unbeatable

Soccer Gaels running strong

by Benny

The Golden Gaels maintained their unblemished record this week, taking three of a possible four points. The lost point, although not a catastrophe, rankled the Gaels nevertheless. Coach John Walker was vehement after Saturday's match over the quality of officiating. Queen's had two goals called back for what they considered less than legitimate reasons.

Law 11 of the soccer rules can be summarized by saying, "If in the opinion of the Referee a player is not interfering with the play he shall not be considered offside regardless of his position." The Gaels scored on a header from a throw in, but the linesman signalled offside. This decision, although contrary to the rules, was allowed to stand, not once, but twice.

A measure of the flow of the game was the fact that McMaster was ecstatic to escape with a 0-0 draw. The Gaels deserved a better fate, but were victims of their own inconsistent play. Numerous opportunities were missed when an extra touch allowed the gaps to close. As Walker stormed up and down the touchline, Queen's nearly snatched a victory, as a last second shot rattled off the post and rolled along the goal line, only to be cleared away.

Sunday was a similar story, as the Gaels ran the opposition ragged in the first 45 minutes, but couldn't put the ball in the net. Brock, losers to RMC on Saturday, possessed some degree of skill, but the Gaels made them look even more effective with sloppy play.

After a stern "chat" during the interval, Queen's finally started to play as though they wanted to win. Steve McKay opened the scoring, volleying home a 30 yarder at the 70th minute. Wally "Spaceman" Klaus sewed up the victory taking crosses from Human Cornell and a Brock defender, and tucked both chances away with little difficulty.

Goal keeper Carl Saunders continues to lead the league with what must be the lowest goals against average in Queen's history. Only two shots have eluded the lanky Montreuil for a G.A.A. of 0.333. With three games left in the regular schedule, playoff positions are still unsettled. The one thing everyone wishes to avoid is a mid-week playoff game in Sudbury, thus the scramble for top spot in the league table. Queen's hopes to have Brian Sawyers back in action after suffering a partial shoulder operation. In the intervening time Mike Appleby, has played well as did Gerrell Wenger in Sunday's game. Next week the Gaels close out their 'away' games in London before finishing up against RMC and Laurentian.

Queen's didn't fool around with Brock in the second half and recorded an easy 2-0 win last Sunday.

Boneman's Byline

The Queen's Golden Gaels are serious contenders for the national football title this year. Coach Hargreaves has molded superb offensive and defensive units in his three years at the helm. As a result, the Gaels find themselves the only undefeated college football team in the country.

If there is one thing in the way of the national championship besides Acadia, it is the injuries that are hampering the team. Aside from the routine bruises, muscle pulls, and jammed fingers, a number of more serious injuries are plaguing the team.

The game at Molson Stadium sidelined starting quarterback Jim Rutka for the rest of the season with torn knee ligaments. Also at McGill, Blaine Shore suffered strained ankle ligaments, condemning his foot to plaster for two to three weeks.

The week before against Concordia, Dick Bakker went down with a very painful wrist injury, but he still manages to perform. And against the Gee Gees last Friday night, Bob O'Doherty played with a cast on his broken hand.

With injuries to these four key players, the Gaels will have their work cut out for them as they attempt to capture the national championship.

This Saturday at George Richardson Memorial Stadium, the Gaels will play their homecoming game.

Easy sailing

by Clayton Jaeger

The second half of the Ontario Sailing Championships were held at RMC last weekend. The competition this time was much better than before, with Queen's, RMC, York, Waterloo, and Western all sending two 240 crews.

Queen's was the clear winner with only 8 points, RMC followed with 18, York had 21, Waterloo 24, and Western brought up the rear with 27. Mike (Sticky) Glue and crew Sam Cross sailed a perfect regatta, with four points in the A Division.

Sandy Struthers and crew Ian McLaren sailed quite well with two firsts and a second in the B Division. The dinghy race on Saturday was cancelled due to high winds. RMC managed, however, to squeeze in four races on Sunday. The first race of the B Division was protested out due to an improper starting sequence.

There was a Viking 22 race on Saturday, which Queen's won, but due to breakdowns and other problems, the Keelboat series was not completed.

International competition stiffest yet

X-C challenge at Lehigh

by Staff

The Paul Short Memorial 10,000 meter run, staged by Lehigh University of Bethlehem, Pennsylvania, annually provides the stiffest competition the Queen's men's Cross-Country Team encounters during the year. This year the calibre of the competition was higher than ever, yet Queen's placed a creditable sixth place, finishing above schools such as host Lehigh and the University of Richmond (which has two Kenyans on its team).

In the face of such stiff international competition, Adam "Shoe" Shoemaker led the team with a strong tenth place finish, within a minute of the top three runners, all of whom were from Kenya. Adam's tenth place medal was the highest honor ever won by a Queen's runner at Lehigh. Claus Rinne, who insists he finished twenty-seventh but was given the twenty-eighth position, was very satisfied with his finishing time of 33:10 less than a minute behind "Shoe". A mere eleven seconds later, Ian Gale finished continuing his strong comeback. Not more than three weeks ago Ian was huring so much he couldn't race. Another fifteen seconds ticked off, and Mike Debrida finished just another sixteen seconds ahead of Jeff Bellinger. Bob Graham, returning in 34:08 with Sandy MacAuley finishing soon after to round out the Queen's varsity runners.

In the open class 10,000 meter run, four more Queen's men ran against very tough competition. Dale Friesen ran a fine 35:26 which gave him 28th position in a field of over eighty. Twenty-one seconds later, veteran Les McGregor finished. Earlier in the week, Les won a four mile race held at RMC. Rookie Hugh Tafel ran an excellent 35:57 for 36th. Coach Dave Grant was battling a severe cold as well as the competition and could only run 36:34, but is confident he will be healthy again for the Ontario Cross-Country Championships next week.

So, with just two more races before the OUA's, the men's cross country team is in excellent shape to take the team title as well as the possibility of

Rugby at London

Seconds triumph

by Wally Hurtz

It was a somber Queen's 1st. XV Rugby Club that made their way off the pitch Thanksgiving Saturday. A disappointing 9-10 loss to the University of Western Ontario Mustangs constituted the Queen's team's equivalent of the turkey.

Although the Gaels were often in the Western half, they could not capitalize on the ball they did get on the second phase. The Mustangs, however, were more fortunate in taking advantage of scoring opportunities. Indeed, Western forced the play in the Queen's end zone and managed a try. In addition Western converted a penalty kick.

The teams pride was not the only injury sustained in the first XV's defeat. First team stalwart Don (Maddog) Cameron injured ligaments in his left knee. His counterpart at wing forward, Jim Stone, was over a barrel with stomach discomfort which manifested itself after the match.

The second XV's, however, were the antithesis of the 1st XV, outscoring their London hosts 23-0. Scores were recorded by Dave "Flash" Cottingham, Dennis Johnson, Andy Boright, and Timmy Price. Although perennially shut-out, Tim Hyde and Fraser Mackenzie demonstrated adroit rugby skill. John Reid, coming off a serious knee injury, was able to kick a penalty and two conversions.

Unfortunately for the Rugby Gaels and Rugby alumni, both teams will be travelling Homecoming weekend. The first XV will be playing against Brock University at St. Catharines and the undefeated second XV will be at Peterborough to duel with Trent University. Despite their defeat the first XV are still very much in contention. With the defeat of arch-rival Waterloo, the Gaels still have a modicum of breathing room.

Touch football tourney coming

by Geoff Maier and Paul Spence

As part of this year's United Way Campaign, a touch football tournament will be held on the afternoon of Fri. Oct. 20 and on Saturday Oct. 21 at Tindall Field. Any group of ten players is allowed to enter and applications with a $20 entry fee will be accepted Wed. Oct. 11, Thurs. Oct. 12, Fri. Oct. 13 in Mac. Corry A 301 between 10 A.M. and 3 P.M.

This is a first rate opportunity for residences, Bews teams and classes to get together in the search for the best touch football players in the university. It is also a time to show up your own Bews' team.

All the money goes to the United Way. Prizes will be awarded to the Championship team, the runner-up and the consolation winners. Molson's will provide individual trophies

Views still pertinent

Krista Macots, Journal editor in 1967-1968, died last weekend. Her tenure as editor came at a time when students, particularly, and North American youth in general, were beginning to confront the contradictions and tumult that adult society had seemingly created. In describing the youth of the day, she once said, "It is a generation that demands power."

Krista shared the idealism and disillusionment of the "sixties youth". In her first editorial, she lambasted Queen's administration, the examination system, the student government, and tuition fees. She concluded,

"The question is, what are you going to do about these problems while you are here?"

You can sit around, as most of us do, feeling powerless, helpless and ignorant, or you can begin to educate yourself and others about your immediate environment, the university, and the society to which it caters."

Krista died near the end of a decade that has been characterized by a decline in the very attitudes and ideals that she both forwarded and grew out of. The issues of greater student representation, tuition fees, and an active and constructive student government have faded in importance in the eyes of most students.

Taking a look back — to a time when students like Krista were suddenly resolved to change the direction of a world they didn't like — must cause us to take pause and consider our own condition.

What have we done since we've been here?

Whether this institution has been our home for two months or two years, have we yet come to terms with the problems that existed in October of 1967 and still exist in October of 1978?

Have we sat around, feeling powerless?

These questions were posed by Krista then, and are still valid today. In more ways than one, we remember you, Krista.

Liberals in peril?

Next week Prime Minister Trudeau's Liberal government will face its most severe test since 1974. To be sure no Liberal Cabinet minister will be able to joke about the results, as was the case after the recent Conservative victory in Nova Scotia's provincial election. Every indication is that the anti-government trend so forcibly displayed in Nova Scotia will be asserted in the October 16 by-elections.

Granted, the Liberals do stand a good chance of winning the Quebec by-elections in Lotbinière, St. Hyacinthe, and Westmount. The spirit of Claude Wagner, André Fortin et al, notwithstanding, it is Monsieur Trudeau and the unity bandwagon that will again win the day.

The appeal of DREE grants (Quebec has received more such grants than even the Maritimes) will not have the same impact in Toronto. Indeed, the Liberal's rising stars are deeply in trouble. Dr. John Evans, the witty ex-president of the University of Toronto, is of course hoping to defeat David Crombie. Regrettably for Evans, Crombie appears to be so assured of Rosedale that he is campaigning for party leader. Likewise for the Liberals Doris Anderson, the ex-Chatelaine editor, who is running in Eglinton. This well-versed and attractive candidate is in a very close contest with Rob Parker, a relative unknown from the Tory ranks.

The point is that the Liberal's well-known pattern of bringing in candidates from outside the ranks of the party to win "easy" ridings and become political wizards is failing. So, for that matter, may be the concomitant practice of "parachuting" popular, well-known candidates into constituencies to which they have few, if any, acquaintances or ties. The "Natural Governing Party" and its chief strategist, Senator Keith Davy, appear to have finally pushed the Canadian voter to the limit. Belegged by economic woes and an atmosphere of combative Federalism, the voter is turning away from the ad hoc policies of the Liberals.

Perhaps the undecided vote (34% according to the Gallup Poll taken September 7-9), would be slightly diminished if only they were not so aware of what must be the Liberals last-chance and potentially successful general election slogan; "Look at the alternatives!"

But the most important result of this by-election may be the effect Conservative victories could have on Trudeau's tenure as leader of the Liberal Party. Rumour has it that Trudeau may be pressured by senior cabinet members to step down if the Liberals fail to defeat the Conservatives convincingly.

Although the scenario may seem somewhat tenuous, one must wonder how long eminent Liberals and the party hierarchy will back Trudeau in light of eminent demise. They are not lightly called the Natural Governing Party

Student bootlegging fines

by Tom Mohr

Ten Queen's students were convicted of bootlegging in Provincial Court last Thursday. The students, charged as a result of police raids on two parties during Orientation Week, have been levied beer confiscations and fines totalling $4,700.

Law student Tony Hine, representing one group of students, said "I'm amazed. Obviously they (the Court) decided to screw Queen's and that's exactly what they did."

Hine felt that the Court's decision was stiff under the circumstances, and is presently considering appeal. He is inclined against it, though, because "Appeal courts are not disposed to reverse fines regardless of their severity," he said.

Each of the ten students was assessed a $300 fine and $1600 in beer was confiscated. The maximum penalty for bootlegging is $2,000 and one year in jail.

Joe Dewhurst, Director of Queen's Legal Aid, attended the trial. While he was disappointed that the fines were as stiff as they were, he said he wasn't surprised.

"I've defended enough bootleggers in my practice, and when they were found guilty they went to jail. It is unfortunate, but not surprising, that the court was not persuaded to take a lenient view," he said.

The convictions related to charges arising out of two police raids on September 14. At that time, parties at 166 University Ave. and 258 Earl St. were infiltrated by undercover police who collected evidence subsequently used to prosecute the offenders.

Rector resigns

by John Philp

More Chochla, Queen's Rector, has resigned after two years of his three year term. Rectors traditionally resign one year prior to the end of their term. Chochla, a '78 graduate of Law, is presently living in Toronto.

The Rectorship was established in 1912. Major responsibilities of the position include being the student's representative on the Board of Trustees and being a non-partisan ombudsman for students as well as appearing at important social and university events including convocation.

Until 1972 the position was filled by prominent Canadians, including O.D. Skelton, the Rt. Hon. R.B. Bennett and Leonard Brockington. Often the office was regarded as an honour rather than an active position.

When the Rectorship was established as a student position the term was set at three years. Formerly, Rectors had served for up to twenty years.

Hugh Christie, former AMS President, and Paul Tinari, Applied Science '80 have declared their candidacy for the position, the only students to do so thus far.

Once a Queen's fan...these veteran supporters braved the cold and rain to recall old victories and relish memories as they gathered for Homecoming details page 5.

Who's Where arrives on time

by JO-Anne Stead

Who's Where is where it should be: here.

One thousand advanced copies of Who's Where will be distributed tomorrow from Info Bank in the John Deitch Centre. The other 8,200 will be distributed on Friday, according to editor Chris Chenoweth.

Chenoweth's goal in this year's Who's Where was, "to give the book theme and continuity instead of having it looking like a Simpsons-Sears Catalogue."

80 percent of the book has been redesigned and the layout has been changed. The book's theme "University Through the Looking Glass" is evident with "Alice in Wonderland" title pages graphically illustrated.

Chenoweth had problems with the book from the beginning. He was appointed to the position late, and had no office or files when he started.

There was also trouble keeping within the budget. The book will run a $3,000 deficit this year. The deficit is due to an outdated budget, according to Chenoweth. It hasn't been revised in 10 years, while printing costs alone have increased $1,500, and the telephone systems meant an extra $2,000, he noted.

"If a $3,000 deficit means a more accurate telephone book coming out two weeks before last year's and the book is rewritten, then Who's Where had little choice but to go ahead and spend the needed money," Chenoweth stated.

"The accuracy of the book was one of the main priorities," added Chenoweth. There are 50 percent fewer errors in the telephone numbers and more accurate corrections.

The university administration contributed $1,000, and the Who's Where contributed an extra $2,000 outside of the book's budget for improvements. The AMS will review recommendations made by Chenoweth in the near future.

"Had the book broken even financially, there would have been no possible way it could have improved over last year's edition," said Chenoweth, "but despite some of these problems I am very pleased about the progress of Who's Where."

Communications group

AMS reaching out

by Karen McNeil

The AMS has set up a new "communications group", in order to promote better understanding of the total function of the AMS by Queen's students.

According to Richard Binhammer, Internal Affairs Commissioner, under whose auspices the group has been set up, "It's a worthwhile attempt to raise the profile of the AMS. It's a very fast-acting, innovative group, and I think it will continue to be innovative, because there was a great concern among them at the first meeting to move away from conventional methods of reaching people."

Some of the methods used by the group so far have been stickers with such slogans as "AMS: more than pubs", "AMS and you", hand-stamps with similar slogans used at Oom Pah Pah, and a banner, displayed at last Saturday's football game, which read "Get interested in your AMS".

The members will try to improve the image of the AMS by stressing the services it offers, and the fact that it is an administrative body truly interested in students' welfare. In addition, they hope that an increased awareness of, and interest in the AMS will end the spate of acclamations to the top AMS positions, which have occurred in the past years.

The members seem very enthused about the direction the group is taking. "It's got a pretty good future", said Rosemary Chambers, "We've only had one meeting, but there seems to be a lot of ideas coming forth. We all agreed that there was a need to better the image of the AMS... to communicate that it exists for students."

Ecosystem in danger: ex-prof

by Julia Grunau

If we don't start thinking soon about improving our ecosystem and biosphere, our environment will be irrevocably damaged.

That is the message of Dr. Jack Vallentyne, former Queen's Biology professor turned senior research

When the fines were first announced by the judge, the courtroom was filled with gasps. AMS Chief Prosecutor Mark Baker whispered, "I can't believe it!"

In assessing the sentence, Dewhurst noted, "One might reasonably surmise it was in the court's mind that special preference not be given to university students."

Leslie Anderson, speaking on her own behalf before sentencing, asked the court to give her at least six months to pay her fine. Upset and at times breaking into tears, she said, "If you are going to fine me $300 then I request at least six months to pay it. My parents don't contribute anything to my education, and I don't have much money."

"We've been going to parties like this since we were in first year. We told the police we were going to hold it, through the Orientation Committee, and they raided us anyway. If I'd had the slightest idea I was doing something wrong, I would never have done it," she added.

Constables criticize 'stupid display' at game

Staff

Rowdiness at Queen's football games has reached a potentially dangerous point, one AMS constable told the Journal following the game. Last Saturday's fans witnessed an incident when an unidentified male wearing an Engineering jacket climbed the centre lighting pole on the student's bleachers, sat on the pinnacle for approximately five minutes and returned to the stands only to ask, "Did you get my picture?" Constables assigned to the "Engineering" section of the stands were unable to prevent the ascent because all four were busy elsewhere "breaking up fights". Some members of the crowd actually began a "Jump, jump, jump" chant.

While panic reigned below, the pole climber ignored pleas from constables and friends to come down. The danger of a serious fall was compounded by the risk of electrocution that the combination of high voltage and rain presented One constable was heard to say, "It's the stupidest display I've ever seen".

He will be speaking at Stirling Hall at 8:00 p.m. on October 19.

Band blows G.W. . . away

by B.J. Smith

The Queen's Bands rolled to an easy victory over Golden Words staff in a spartan football match-up last Friday.

The second annual Mud Bowl, held at Frank Tindall field, lived up to its name as both teams were severely tested by the quagmire pitch. A disorganized and befuddled Golden Words team proved unequal to the task in dropping a 36-3 decision.

Queen's Bands defence, known in sports circles as "The Big D", delivered a spectacular performance, frustrating G.W. attackers in play after play.

The "Big O" for Bands was led by star receiver and accomplished snare drummer Margo McFingers. Her amazing speed and agility characterized the offensive team's powerful drive.

"There's no way we can catch them, they are just too fast for us," observed G.W. quarterback Rob Cockburn.

"We had to resort to dirty tricks,"

Executive in residence

by Beth McKenzie

Mr. William J. Bennett, a well known Canadian businessman, will be offering his services to Queen's students in the newly created position of Executive in Residence, during the months of October and November.

As the guest of the School of Business and the Centre for Resource Studies, Mr. Bennett will be taking part in classes, lectures and informal student gatherings, as well as being available to offer advice and insight into both the public and private sectors of the Canadian economy.

Mr. Bennett began his career as a civil servant in Ottawa, in the position of executive assistant to the powerful cabinet minister, C.D. Howe. He aided Mr. Howe in the creation of Air Canada, The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and the post-war industrialization of Canada.

From 1946-58, his titles included the presidencies of both Eldorado Mining and Refining Ltd., and Atomic Energy of Canada. He also served as president of the Iron Ore Company of Canada from 1965 until his retirement in 1977.

Mr. Bennett is still active as a director on boards of such companies as Cominco Ltd., Phillips Electronic of Canada and Canadian Pacific, and so is splitting his work week between his duties in Montreal and his activities here at Queen's. His wide experience in Canadian business affairs will make him a valuable source of information for students in fields such as mining, politics and economic history, as well as enabling him to provide commerce students with an authoritative view of actual business practices.

Cattenach calls for input

by Michael Allen

Rory Cattenach, A.M.S. Vice-President of University Affairs, made clear that student opinion would have an important effect on the appointment of a Principal for Queen's when Principal Watts' first five year term expires next fall.

While Dr. Watts is eligible for reappointment, the joint Senate-Board of Trustees Committee, responsible for making a recommendation to the Board on the Principalship, is actively seeking the views of all members of the University of potential candidates for the office.

The A.M.S. requests that all student submissions be forwarded to one of Rory Cattenach, Moe Chockla, student Senator Brenda Finley, Barry Shelp or the A.M.S. Office, by this Friday in advance of the Committee meeting Saturday.

Rally wet but organizers say it was still a success

by Debbie MacLeod

A protest was staged Saturday, October 14 against the federal government's proposed cutbacks to the unemployment system.

Fifteen students attended. It was organized by the Kingston Coalition for Full Employment, Queen's Students Against Cutbacks and Unemployment (QSACU), the Kingston Committee of the Unemployed and several local unions, including CUPE.

Originally scheduled to be a rally at Confederation Park across from City Hall, supporters decided to hold the meeting at the office of the Labour Council, located near the corner of Princess and Barrie.

The proposed cutbacks are seen by rally organizers as an attempt to deny citizens their right to unemployment insurance benefits. Under the new proposal, benefits will be lowered from 66.6% to 60% of previous earnings. To be eligible for Unemployment Insurance, an additional employment period of 40 weeks over the past two years will be required and eligibility requirements may go up with application, depending upon the amount of time worked.

In spite of the inclement weather, the meeting was a great success in Michelle Meyers' view, who is a member of QSACU. She stated that even though the organizations who were present at the rally were diversified in the groups they represented, there was a strong unity in their cause.

"Unity of this type is important if the groups are to have any effective power," she said.

Obviously, organizations such as QSACU believes it is facing a strong opponent, and it is difficult to gain public support for its cause, when, "The general public attitude toward the cutbacks protest shows almost extreme conservatism. Public protest is considered unacceptable," Meyer said.

"It also doesn't help when the public looks to the media for information, as the media has been playing the issue low-key. The AMS has given only wishy-washy support for the QSACU," she added.

For the past couple of years different groups have been pitted against each other by the government, says Meyer.

"Students who complain against tuition hikes and demand improved education standards are seen as being avaricious and without a cause. Women who have to resort to traditional men's jobs for employment only provoke anger from the men, and vice-versa," she added.

Meyer senses that the public is either partially or totally unaware of the issue of cutbacks and its effect on unemployment.

A Cutbacks Week will likely be held the week of November 3 to increase student awareness of the cutbacks issue.

During my time at Queen's I have been involved in student government on several levels. I have been a DSC representative in the Political Studies and Sociology Departments, and I am presently the chairperson of QSAU and a member of the AMS Policy Advisory Committee. Through this involvement I realize how much there is to do in student government. I feel that I am a responsible person with a lot of ideas and energy, willing to get involved.

I also have a strong conviction that each and every student needs to be represented in student government in order to lend perspective to the policy-making process. It is this grassroots organization that I would especially like to attend to.

Unlike many, I do not believe that apathy is the rule of the day. I am of the opinion that there is a communication gap somewhere along the line.

For example, the A.M.S. has an operating budget of approximately $147,000.00. How many of you were aware of that? Do you know how that money is spent? Would you like some input? The question of Faculty Houses laid bare the issue of the John Deutsch Centre. Now that the first question has been resolved, are we quietly going to forget about the University Centre? It cost us several million dollars, but it is only operating at around fifty percent of capacity - partly because most of us aren't even aware of the facilities offered there.

I believe that I can make a positive contribution to AMS Outer Council.

My interest in student affairs was sparked last spring by the confrontation between the A.M.S. and factions on campus regarding the cutbacks issue. A.M.S. neutrality over the O.F.S. anti-cutbacks rally made me curious as to why the A.M.S. didn't support the rally. I became fully aware, perhaps for the first time, of the tension between the A.M.S. and certain student groups. This awareness prompted me to attend the special A.M.S. meeting dealing with cutbacks which I found highly enlightening.

Since I have had experience with student governments in the past (currently I am on the Artsci '81 year society) I realized the need for a cohesive, responsive student council. This belief and the interest I have developed prompted me to run for the position of one year representative to the Outer Council.

Memories stirred for '28 grad

by Leslie Shannon

Miss Marian Hogg has many cherished memories about the university she has supported since her graduation in 1928. Although she sees great changes in the buildings on campus, she senses that the "family feeling" among the students still prevails.

Miss Hogg was among the Alumni from the years 1918 to 1929 who gathered at various Homecoming activities to reminisce with old classmates and discuss the changes that Queen's has undergone over the years. Members of the Queen's Oral History Project questioned the women on their recollections of the university during both the war and pre-depression years.

Grace Morrison, Arts '18, remembered that "we rode down University Avenue in a horse and buggy." The snow in winter was packed in bumps "on the streets as sleighs slid up and down along the so-called corduroy roads," she said.

During the first years of her studies, Mrs. Morrison recounted how the war halted all social activities as most Queen's men were overseas. Many of the women spent their evenings rolling bandages in building basements, she remembered. As the war was ending, Mrs. Morrison recalled how Grant Hall was converted into a hospital for returning wounded soldiers.

"It wasn't uncommon to pass veterans on crutches on the street", Mrs. Morrison recalled.

An Arts '22 grad recalled the "social evenings" that they enjoyed on Friday evenings in Grant Hall. Many name orchestras visited Kingston for formals in those days, and "quite a few of the Queen's young men wore their father's ill-fitting suits," she said.

She recalled that Queen's was known as a poor university and she was glad that "we had to wear robes to class as many of us only had a few outfits."

It was a time when the two women's residences were called the "Avenmore" and the "Earl Street", or more popularly, "Hencoop". Men were allowed to visit women in the drawing rooms or at Sunday afternoon teas.

Among the things the women felt haven't changed at Queen's, the strong loyalty to the school was predominant. Miss Hogg asserted that, "I'll always support Queen's." This unity still prevailed at the Alumni Luncheon last Saturday when those who were celebrating their 50th and 60th anniversary as grads, stood up and cheered when the Queen's band played.

Home

Staff

Memories were rekindled, and old watering-holes were revisited when Queen's alumni came home last weekend. This year's Homecoming honoured the classes of '18, '28, '43, '48½, and '68. As well as bringing old friends and classmates together again, it gave Queen's alumni and students the chance to compare notes on Queen's life then and now.

Sixty years is a long time, but nonetheless some 1918 graduates showed up this weekend to celebrate their diamond anniversary. Most noted, that although the grounds have changed radically from a few scattered buildings to a sprawling campus, the students remain the same, year after year. "All the crazy things that we used to do, kids today still do", one said.

In 1928, Queen's looked much different than it does now. Leonard Field was a wheat field, and that now familiar Engineer's Haunt, Vic Hall, was non-existent. Ban Righ was the only women's residence. All coeds under 25 years of age, who were not residents of Kingston had to stay in Ban Righ, but this hardly caused overcrowding, since the whole university consisted of only 1200 students.

Queen's was a winning University, then as now, for they won the Grey Cup three years in a row, during the twenties. At that time, anyone could contend for the cup, now highest honour in the Canadian Football League.

With Canada and most of the rest of AMS Constables were faced with a unique dilemma when these wandering bushmen infiltrated the Homecoming parade.

Queen's faithful came out in force, despite abysmal weather, to cheer Gaeis on to a 26-3 win over Carleton the world in the grips of world war, Queen's took on an uncharacteristic atmosphere. Most male students were off on foreign soil, fighting for the cause of freedom. Because the roosters had flown the coop, Queen's became a haven for hens. Near the end of the war, Grant Hall was transformed into a temporary infirmary, and Queen's women found themselves rolling bandages and forwarding the war effort on the home front.

Coming

The war now over, Queen's, like all universities, found itself burgeoning with returning soldiers. Many students had completed most of their program prior to their enlistment, and with only a couple of courses to go, were able to graduate at Christmas. Hence the alumni of 1948½. One science 48½ student commented, "We never missed a Gael game, back in '48½. The team was better then, and the girls were prettier."

A commerce '47 grad said, "It was quite a disappointing experience when I had to graduate from Queen's. I had to become civilized."

While North America and much of the rest of the world were attempting to come to terms with such issues as the Vietnam War, life at Queen's hadn't changed much. Engineers still shaved, freshmen dressed in togas throughout Orientation Week, Bosses, Frees and Gaeis were all called vigilantes, and the student population numbered only 3,000.

Even in '68, there was no pub on campus. The Manor was the place to go.

Biologist lectures on bird mating

Yes, snow geese have fun too

by Tim Greenwood

"Do birds of a feather really flock together?" could be a cliché paraphrasing of biologist Joan Geremita's study into the mating preferences of snow geese. This use of journalistic license is perhaps a little cruel however in view of the ribbing Geremita has taken from colleagues who called her "Mother Goose" when she was pregnant and who warn her "not to put all your eggs into one basket."

Last Friday Geremita addressed a gaggle of mathematicians in Jeffrey Hall on her studies, in a lecture entitled "the random mating of snow geese."

The snow goose is characterized by coming in two colours, snow and blue. They mate for life and the couple return to the female's birth colony to nest. These factors combined to make the bird ideal for Geremita's study. In order to test her hypothesis that the geese mate with birds of their family's colour Geremita utilized the data of Fred Cooke who spent ten summers with the geese in the Arctic.

The study colony at La Perouse Bay is predominantly white yet each summer a few more blue males wing in with the white females they have courted. The blue and the white tend to soak up their winter sun in different locations in Mexico and Geremita found it difficult to explain the white females bringing home a blue goose to Mother. She conceded that "a few stubbornly choose the wrong colour" despite her rule and fantasized that any blue male stuck in a white wintering ground "would snap up any white females willing to mate."

Geremita said that whether geese follow the general rule or not is perhaps a genetic predisposition. She noted that, given the fluctuating

Arctic environment, "sometimes it pays to obey the rules and sometimes it doesn't."

Throughout her lecture which was liberally sprinkled with humour and free of biological jargon Geremita was conscious of the nature of her audience. When one mathematician challenged the statistical validity of one of her observations she demurred to experience saying "maybe you're right."

Scholar-in-residence

by Barbara Crook

Gail Stewart, an economist and public policy consultant, has been appointed Scholar-in-Residence from October 12 to October 27. During this period she will live in the Scholar's Apartment, Victoria Hall, and will be available for consultation and discussion with graduate and undergraduate students and members of the university community.

Stewart's special interest in recent years has been the field of future studies. While at Queen's, she will launch three public gatherings to consider the question, "New Canada, An Idea Whose Times Has Come?" These gatherings, October 18, 19 and 20, will look at current inquiries affecting law, government, and the economics of Canada.

In addition, throughout her stay Gail Stewart wants to explore with the university community what it means in our time to have an "adult mind," and how universities, individuals, and groups can and do contribute to the development of adult minds.

Stewart is a graduate of Queen's, where she received the Gold Medal in Economics and served as Alma Mater society President. Upon completion of her MSc. (Econ.) at the London School of Economics, she spent three years tutoring in Economics at Queen's. She has at various times worked in the field of industrial organization, served on the staff of the Economic Council of Canada, and formed a consulting firm, The Public Policy Concern. Among other activities of the past year, she has served as coordinator of the Canadian report to the International Conference of Social Welfare, and this year is serving as counsellor on the Board of the Queen's Alumnae Association.

The Scholar-in-Residence programme was established by the Office of the Dean of Women to provide students with opportunities to meet and learn from people of distinction in a variety of fields, outside the ordinary classroom situation. Past Scholars-in-Residence have included Christian feminist Shelley Finson, aeronautical engineer Elsie McGill, historian Jo Vellacott, and educator Priscilla Galloway.

Sidewalk Cafe - in whose interest?

The Editor:

I am writing this while seated at one of the "new and improved" tables in our Student Union. It may be filled with numerous mistakes because, for two reasons, I am writing it hastily. Firstly, the chairs are so incredibly uncomfortable that to sit in them for any length of time would be impossible and secondly, Food Services may eject me for lingering too long and consuming too little.

Apparently this is the main reason the the seating "improvements". Food Services has run a steady deficit because, much to their chagrin, students don't come into the Union and shovel food down their throats but rather come to sit and talk and read. It would seem to me that a University service should concern itself with the welfare of the students it was created to serve, and not get caught up in the production line fervour of a commercial enterprise and allow itself to be blinded by the loss of a few dollars. Anyway, if students decide to consume coffee slowly during the day and put Food Services slightly in the red, surely it is our privilege if at night we consume beer rapidly and keep the Pub solidly in the black.

This insidious deterioration of the Union has been going on for a long time and something has to be done before the Golden Arches spring up outside the University Centre. In 1971, when I first arrived, at the friendly Union downstairs you could get a 15c coffee in a good (big) china cup and a heaping hot roast beef on a china plate that could be devoured with real utensils. You could pull up a chair, shoot the breeze and generally not go to class. Now we have "progressed" to a 30c coffee in a styrofoam container and cold sandwiches on paper plates that must be dissected with the help of plastic knives and forks. Yes Food Services, "You do it all for me".

All I can hope is that everyone will get upset enough to not patronize the Union as it is now and maybe the movable tables and comfortable chairs will reappear as miraculously as they disappeared.

P.S. My hint to increase consumption of food is not to make the seating worse but to make the food a little better.

Yours indignantly
Tom Hamilton/Law '80

Appointments need student input

by Paul Tinari

The most important factor which all students must realize is that by far the largest single area of expenditure that the university makes is staff salaries. Thus, in this period of financial constraint, it should be the concern of all students that these funds are used for the maximum benefit to the quality of education at Queen's University.

The trends which can be expected to dominate the 1980's have already begun. Among other things, the traditional methods of tenure and promotion will come increasingly under attack as being outdated, and no longer satisfactorily catering to the institution's needs.

A wide-sweeping system of tenure applying to all areas of the university is not the answer. Each faculty and/or department has its own special needs, so policies which could be acceptable to one area of the university, could be less so to another. Thus, like the structure of Canadian federalism where the provinces are given certain amounts of autonomy under the watchful eye of the government in Ottawa, the various departments of the university must also have a degree of freedom to organize themselves.

Thus, since tenure decisions will ultimately affect all students in some way or another, this period of restricted funds has made it imperative that students have some say on the decisions which are made regarding the men and women who will give them instruction, that is some meaningful representation on appointment and tenure committees.

Queen's University has one of the oldest histories of student government in Canada, and the great success of the institution has clearly demonstrated, that students make significant contributions to the operation of the university at the executive level. It is certain that the University would benefit from active student participation on the tenure and promotion committees.

Thanks for Homecoming

THE EDITOR

I'd just like to thank all those who gave all their time and effort to make the alumni events of this past weekend such a success. Homecoming was created for the alumni, and this year in particular they certainly enjoyed it.

From the first signing in and tour of Kingston and the Queen's Campus the emphasis was on treating the alumni well. Many thanks to all the hostesses, tour guides, escorts and enthusiasts who did exactly that.

The final student-alumni event the Blind Date at the Pub was a great success, a tradition I hope to see carried on for many years to come. I view of the enthusiastic response future alumni-student events are in the planning stages.

Thank you to the Alumni office for their great support, and to all the students who made Homecoming weekend special.

Homecoming bridges generation gap

Prof: CFRC a "veritable oasis"

The Editor:

I must take issue with your entertainment editor's badly researched, disjointed article in Entertainment Forum (CFRC: Who's Listening, Queen's Journal 106 No. 15, 13, October 5, 1978). Mr. Copp at first asserts that "CFRC has made a peculiar commitment to hodge-podge programming in the interest of 'community service'....'story time' one minute, Beethoven the next, and the Rolling Stones a bit later in the evening...." He then suggests that the students are not tuning in to CFRC, presumably since programming is too esoteric, since programming changes every hour or so and since the schedule is unknown to all but club members. Mr. Copp then switches gears to argue that the function of a radio station is to "cover a broad base" like the local commercial stations which, he says, are "transmitting endless hours of pops, MOR and country and western". In the interests of broadening its base, Mr. Copp would prefer that CFRC have a single category format which he, and therefore all other students must enjoy; that is, nothing but folk and rock. And he could then leave his dial set for endless, seamless, wall-to-wall, numbing, mindless drivel.

Mr. Copp is arguing for limiting peoples' exposure to just that narrow range of music which they enjoy, and nothing more. He is saying that people should not be offered any material which they do not already know and like. It is an argument against exploration, against new knowledge and understanding, and a plea for ignorance, stultification and limitation of scope. And he would require this sort of programming from a university station!

CFRC is a veritable oasis in the blighted wasteland of Kingston area radio. CFRC broadcasts large doses of folk, rock, jazz, classical, pop, bluegrass, easy listening and ethnic music, as well as commentary, discussion, documentaries and readings. It is a well rounded schedule. The station issues a programme guide which is free to the asking, and the weekly schedule is published every Friday in the Whig Standard.

The major reason that students may be uninformed about the CFRC programme schedule is that your paper, the Queen's Journal, flatly refuses to publish that CFRC programme guide unless the CFRC Radio Club pays for it as advertising.

All in all, Mr. Editor, that article was an unspeakable public display of muck-ignorance by your entertainment editor and a shameful piece of duplicity by yourself in publishing such rot.

Indignantly yours

Principalship open- all comment welcome

by Rory Cattanach
Vice-president University Affairs
A joint committee of the Senate and the Board of Trustees is now deliberating a question which is of monumental importance to Queen's University. They are charged with recommending to the Board of Trustees the appointment of a Principal.

Principal Watts, whose 5 year term ends on Sept. 30, 1979, is eligible for reappointment. However, before the Committee will feel comfortable in making a decision, it requires a strong indication of the views on this issue which are held by the Queen's Community at large.

Students have been given the opportunity for significant input into this decision-making process. There are 3 students and the Rector on this Joint Committee. Please let them know, either by letter or verbal communication, what your views are on the Principalship of our University. This should not only include who you feel is best able to assume the Office of Principal, but also any constructive criticisms of past performances of this office, or suggestions for the future.

Anyone wishing to express their view on the appointment of a principal should contact Brenda Finley, Barry Shelp, Moe Chocla or myself, personally or via the AMS offices, before Friday Oct. 20. The future of the University hinges on this decision—so let's speak out!

Will Watts be back next season?

Communion of altar egos

by Julia Grunau

Last night a bunch of 4Ders in Vic sat up late playing euchre and talking about religion. Two of the group were strangers: one a male guest, the other a Woman Of Mysterious Beauty (henceforth referred to as the W.O.M.B.) from 2E.

"There goes church tomorrow," said one euchre shark, seeing 12:30 a.m. on her clock radio. "I haven't been since I came here."

"Nor I," said the W.O.M.B. "There aren't any Russian Orthodox Churches in Kingston."

"I'm Anglican." Denominational confessions poured in from around the room. None of us had made it to church since the year began.

"Once you come to university you'd better have your religion in your head and not in a church," said somebody. "I'm always too tired from studying to go."

Everyone made affirmative noises.

"How about you? asked the W.O.M.B. of me.

"Um," I said guiltily, reflecting on my churchless past, "Actually I'm a Druid, and we go out in the woods and worship nature and stuff."

Evidently Queen's is very open-minded; Russian Orthodox and United and Anglican and Druid can live in eucharistic harmony. Even if we don't always make it to church.

The Queen's Journal, Tuesday, October 17, 1978

by Colin Brown

On a sunny yet somehow depressing Sunday afternoon there are many thoughts which come to mind concerning Homecoming weekend, but the most stirring and adventurous of all is the Voyage of the Zingmobile.

She was conceived in the driveway of a modest two storey home on Earl St., christened "Zingmobile" in honour of a rather noxious beverage peculiar to the members of said residence. Its exact properties are not known by any one man, but the Zingini seems to combine the worst of red wines together with liberal doses of the worst of gins, usually in a five to one ratio, though some brave souls have attempted a more fatal combination. The effects of a Zingini at nine a.m. is needless to say, quite devastating though some are quick to point out the advantages of being able to stomach any combination of food and drink immediately afterwards, due to the fact after one gulp of Zingini one's taste buds are crippled for at least the next twenty-four hours.

The Zingmobile was not as colorful as some of the floats, to be quite honest it was little more than a pick-up truck with a large rotting oil drum and some eight foot poles stuck on the back. The oil drum was covered with a bedsheet to simulate a milk bottle, from which Zinginis are traditionally consumed. A banner was hoisted aloft between the two poles, giving the vehicle the appearance of a cross between a lobsided tow truck and Jed Clampett's family sedan. She was hastily christened with a splash of the purple liquid across her hood, then we set sail for the parade.

Well, it seems the Zingini banner was so tall and majestic that it often tangled with rival trees and telephone wires, much to the anxiety of the crowd riding on the back. The pick up truck's tires were squashed to the pavement under the load and, much to driver's anxiety, (whose grandfather had loaned him the vehicle a few days before) smoke began billowing out amidst and all hands abandoned ship until this performance came to an end. Yet, we made it to the game, and left her by the gate standing proud and dignified amongst a crowd of curious onlookers.

Afterwards we scuttled her. It was simply a matter of necessity. The game was over, and the sad remains of the pick-up had to be returned the next day. We canalized her right there in the stadium parking lot. Down came the banners and bottles, out the back went the oil drum. And they lie there still today, a memorial to the great pilgrimage, and a great lady. We will think of her often.

University - what's the point of it all?

Does anyone know?

by David Corbett,
Arts student

Ever since I was a wee little lad, I have had one burning desire. Whenever bothersome maiden aunts would flash a sickly sweet smile and ask, "What are you going to do when you grow up?" I would defiantly announce that I was going to university!

To the horror of my friends and family, I doggedly pursued this goal throughout my days at high school.

In depressed tones they would mutter to themselves, "Why couldn't he have run away to South America, or become an alcoholic, or turned to a life of crime and debauchery? If he goes to college, it will destroy the reputation of the family for generations. He might become (gasp, wheeze) educated!"

Finally, they recognized their impending demise, and tried to console themselves with shallow rationalizations: "Oh well, at least he'll end up unemployed."

However, attempts to thwart me never ceased. My applications to universities were eaten by the dog. I received threatening telephone calls. The family doctor tried to admit me to a Home for the Utterly Bewildered.

On the day that I was to leave for Queen's, I was violently abducted by my 97 year old great grandmother (who is quite strong, and quite insane).

Then, mysteriously, my '63 Rambler, laden with all my possession (I only had one as I recall), blew up in a Kresge's parking lot. I made it anyway; but my trials and tribulations never end.

When I return home for Christmas, I inevitably receive practical gifts designed for use in my future trade: lawn mowers, rakes. The works. One year I discovered that I had been betrothed to a Yugoslavian peasant girl who wanted me barefoot, impregnating, and in the kitchen fixing the plumbing.

Once, by chance, I mentioned Descartes. "Aha," exclaimed my father, "I think, therefore I go to the bathroom." An idle mention of Canadian literature prompted a question as to whether a cure had been found for it yet. I could go on and on.

In fact, the more I am at University, the more I tend to go on and on. My Persian analyst, who is an ardent admirer of Pope Vesuvius XXII, points out that I am spending the best years of my life in an ivory tower. I note that he spent eight years in an ivory tower himself, and I can only wonder at who must be carrying the burden of responsibility for having let him out.

This article may not have been particularly cogent, but there is a moral to it (insert angel choir and fanfare here): if you are an undergraduate and are 100% sure of why you are here, then you are way ahead of me, and probably in a distinct minority.

Perhaps university is so many things to so many individuals that it cannot be fully appreciated until it has been left behind.

Balancing act for the student

by Graham Sellers
arts student

The student population at Queen's can be roughly divided into two equally disappointed and frustrated groups. There are those who come here to improve their critical perception, to explore the vast realms of human knowledge, to expand their minds; they quickly discover that they are either too stupid to learn, or too distracted by campus activities to devote enough time or energy to their studies.

Then there are those who are lured to Queen's by tales of endless parties, multitudes of clubs, and a vast, thinly populated arena for the politically ambitious. They soon disappear beneath a panoply of assignments, essays, seminars and readings which leaves them little time for anything but the least strenuous and most elementary forms of relaxation, the television room and the pub.

At some point in our university career, most of us decide that we are rapidly bypassing the educational opportunities that will only be available once in our lives. So we migrate from one group to the other, only to discover that the other half has not found a better way; they are simply sacrificing different things.

Theoretically this dilemma could be eliminated by a "balanced life", but we seem to need four years to learn the balancing act, and by then the time of our lives has passed.

Meanwhile we live in a pressure cooker, and frantically vacillate between extremes, struggling to meet impossible essay deadlines one week, and skipping classes to attend meetings and parties or write journal articles the next. We find the time to do many things, but there never seems to be enough time to do anything well.

Yet strangely enough, that doesn't matter. Our essays or experiments will never be published, our articles or speeches will not mould men's minds, our organizations will not change the world; but we are not supposed to be eremetic monks or journalistic protagonists or political demagogues.

We are students. We come here to learn to cope with ourselves and with life, to gather and synthesize practical and theoretical knowledge about widely diverse subjects, to form our ideals and attitudes. Our failures or successes are not important. We are still growing. We are a resource.

It is unfashionable to suggest that we are preparing in some way to improve society, but I have yet to encounter a better justification for a university. Without some sense of responsibility our lives will become hollow, and our activities will degenerate into mere games.

A factory generating students

The university has a continuing obligation to keep a balance between the advancement of knowledge, professional education, general education, and the demands of student life.

-James Bryant Conant-1948

by Morris Chocla
former Queen's Rector

During the past eight years we have lost the "balance" of which Conant wrote in 1948. We have succumbed to the erroneous vision of universities as factories generating automatons to operate the technical complexities of modern societies.

Universities have been under immense pressure to channel energy and resources into the advancement of knowledge and professional education. Society has sought to impose a short-sighted view of universities upon governments and educational institutions.

It has been argued that in times of financial constraint, a university's activity must result in direct and ascertainable contributions to the economy. The university community in Canada has been unable to educate and convince governments and society of the greater importance of universities. As a result, the value of a general education has been lost to the utilitarian view.

We, as members of the university community, have failed to demonstrate that society needs, not only technical experts, but those who are humane and wise and who, in the long-run, can understand the complexities of society, not through technical knowledge, but through a wider vision and awareness of the world in which we live.

We have failed to demonstrate that a general education for all those who are capable of achieving set standards would raise the level of awareness of society resulting in a solid basis upon which we might increase our involvement in formulating the policy and guidelines under which society is to operate.

Furthermore, we have failed to demonstrate that a general education for a wider cross-section of capable people will elevate our living standard, not in a material sense, but in a spiritual and intellectual sense.

It is incumbent upon us to initiate the movement of society from a preoccupied huddling around television sets to the excitement of reading and understanding good literature, listening to and understanding the spoken words of thinking men, and engaging in intelligent, and enlightened discussions, in an attempt to make some sense of our complex society.

This greater vision of universities must not be discarded for the narrow view which has become alarmingly popular.

The businessman's point of view

by W. N. Bowden

business executive in residence
There is no single business view of the role of the University, but there is a general opinion that the role of business in our society has not always been fairly presented at the University. Universities might well hold the same opinion about their role, which would seem to emphasize the need for better communication. Graduates should understand how our business system works because these graduates will have a great part in making the system work, or in changing it.

Graduates should be prepared for the change to a working environment. Businessmen could be of help in this preparation. Since a large proportion of graduates will eventually find a place in business of some kind, both the University and business have a mutual interest in making the transition as smooth as possible.

Business should be able to expect that the University will make an effective guidance system available for those who need it. Possibly business should take a more active interest both in funding and in providing information and resource personnel for such a service.

Business expects Universities to have some responsibility for shaping the overall attitude of society in a rational way. It is from our Universities that we should be hearing some well-reasoned and balanced viewpoints.

Business will expect a good presentation of the need for future financial support. It has made substantial contributions in the past, and will undoubtedly continue selective support as it needs University graduates in the future and is interested in maintaining the quality of education they receive.

Business does not want graduates who expect too much immediately. It wants to retain the new employee and cannot satisfy unrealistic expectations. There will be a period of adjustment and learning on the job. A graduate should be prepared to some extent for what he will find in a working environment. He should understand that he is a better employee only if he is a better person.

Nimmons 'N' Nine Plus Six

Talent eclipsed by backup band

by Brent Laviolette

The Dean of Canadian jazz brought his band and his magic to Grant Hall last Thursday; the band worked fine, but the magic was not consistent. As Phil Nimmons told the audience himself, the Queen's concert was simply a dress rehearsal for Friday's big show at the National Arts Centre in Ottawa.

Awkward moments detracted from the overall performance. Sound levels were not consistent; during her first solo much of Kathryn Moses' vocal was lost to the background music and, a jam session featuring the band, Big Miller and Ms. Moses ground to an abrupt halt when no one picked up the lead line. The audience accepted these shortcomings with politeness, but their overall response was undoubtedly affected.

The musical mediums of jazz and blues demand a high-intensity level of communication. It is not enough for a band to reach out to the audience. For the magic to be there the audience must reciprocate that contact and show their appreciation, even if it's only a smile. To jazz purists a concert is almost a religious happening. Thursday night's Grant Hall audience, for the most part, were unwilling to enter into that communion and no matter how much the band cooked, the electricity couldn't achieve its full potential.

There were, however, several musical highlights during the two hour performance when the band and guest artists were supreme. Kathryn Moses' skill and tremendous agility as a flautist and as a vocalist was demonstrated early in the show with the tunes "It's Spring", "And That Ain't Good", and "Music in my Heart". Her voice was often lost in the instrumentals, though, and it wasn't until the latter of these three songs, with a solo piano accompaniment, that the audience was treated to a true demonstration of her ability as a jazz singer.

The blues of Big Miller were almost as garbled in Grant Hall. A great place for brass instrument resonance but not for mixing sound levels. "Big" received a formal round of applause for his efforts and deserved much more. Phil's pronouncement that Kathryn and Big's duet of "The Masquerade is Over" would be the evening's highlight could not hold up against the strong playing of the Nimmons 'N' Nine Plus Six band. The band was excellent at times, especially during solos, and stole the show from everyone. In particular "Bronze", the last movement from the 1976 recording Invocation proved to us all what Herbie Spanier and Keith Jollimore, two fossils in a sea of young faces, are still doing by kicking around with Phil Nimmons. Spanier and Jollimore transcended the rest of the evening's experience with their raw, taut solos on this bold-edged tune.

A good evening's entertainment but not as satisfying as one might have expected from Canada's premiere innovative jazz band.

Herbie Spanier and Keith Jollimore brew up a storm during "Bronze".

The band, Phil Nimmons, and Ms. Moses watch while Big Miller does his thing.

Misdirected priorities: the arts and gov't

by Nick Gray

The National Arts Centre in Ottawa is planning to apply for a $1 million grant to assist in operating their national touring company this year.

The touring company, established last year with a $1 million grant from the federal Treasury Board, is an addition to the regular programme of the N.A.C. The touring company actually consists of two separate companies, one performing in English and the other in French. The Treasury Board felt that in the interests of national unity the initial grant was a worthwhile expenditure.

However, this year's application is an entirely different matter. With the recent cutbacks in the arts the entire national arts community is suffering. Moreover, the regional theatres who suffer from lack of funding are not about to let this one go without a fight. The question that is raised is why does the N.A.C. receive funding when the rest of the arts community is fighting just to stay alive? This question is not without justification.

At the risk of kicking the government when it is down, there are important considerations that should not go without comment. The prime motivation for arts funding in the eyes of the government, in this case, is the interests of national unity. If one could consider national unity isolated from other considerations, all is well and good. But this is not the case.

The N.A.C. is one of the largest theatre organizations in the country. The arts in general promote cultural integrity, but when national unity is dealt with in such a piecemeal fashion, the problem will not improve. One is reminded of a dyke crumbling in thirty odd places with the boy, fingers in the holes, trying to hold back the flood. There is no room for stop-gap measures. The N.A.C. certainly deserves all the financial support that it receives and it would be unfair to admonish them for trying. However, the rest of the country cannot be forgotten or ignored. Theatre productions across Canada are an integral part of our cultural expression. Unfortunately, this government has used only half-hearted efforts to remain viable in the eyes of the electorate. Its policy towards the arts reflects this viability motivation. What needs to be done is to establish a long term policy that will be effective in recognizing the arts contribution in creating a unique Canada.

The N.A.C. feels that the Treasury Board, having established national unity as the prime consideration for approving of the original application last year, should continue to support the programme. Without an additional grant the N.A.C. has stated that it will be unable to continue the current touring programme.

We can all take issue with the N.A.C.'s stance, but that is not the most important problem. In the light of current financial constraints in the arts there must be a concerted effort against half-hearted attempts at stop-gap measures.

The opposition by arts organizations to this application for $1 million will be both strong and justified. To the N.A.C. there is no evidence that the returns justify the investment. More importantly, to the government there is no justification for the approval of an additional $1 million grant to one theatre when the rest are struggling for survival.

Rush is refreshing but bad mix mars concert

by Brent Lavictoire

Aerial opened Rush's Saturday evening concert at the Kingston Memorial Centre and played a half hour of insipid, loud, boring rock and roll. The sound mix was horrible and the lighting poorly coordinated. The kids loved it.

If the band had been able to use their own sound and lighting equipment I'm sure they would have been better. Their first album in the Middle of the Night shows some promise and their earlier success as the band Liverpool should ensure their popularity. Such are the handicaps a band has to accept, however, when they open for a "big name" group like Rush.

Rush's one and a half hour show was a different story entirely. Lighting wizard Howard Ungerleider balanced and deployed his 115,000 watts of light superbly. Unfortunately, the advanced full fidelity sound equipment Rush used was ineffectual in the acoustic albatross of the Memorial Centre. The mix was much too loud and towards the end of the evening seriously detracted from the show through sheer bombardment which exceeded most pain levels. Kingston was the first stop on their present tour and considering the major annoyances for any band on opening night (Geddy Lee's keyboard arrangement did not arrive from the repair shop in Toronto until just before 8:00 p.m.), the show, as a whole, came together very well.

The fantasy-rock Rush presents is a refreshing change in this age of anarchy and violence dominated rock and roll. They take their art very seriously but not themselves. Rush projects a humility about their own music that makes them easily palatable to a variety of tastes and ages.

For "Cygnus X-1", and "Hemispheres", the conclusion to the tale of a space pilot's entrance and passage through a black hole, several rear-projected films were used effectively. The metallic laden prologue for "Cygnus" was accompanied by a simulated flight through the galaxies and bold lettering passing below in true "Star Wars" fashion. A perfect touch to Rush's relaxed fantasy world.

Rush performed their new album Hemispheres, in its entirety, most of a Farewell to Kings and some of their favourites from previous albums

"2112" and "Caress of Steel", a well balanced presentation. Instrumentally the band was very tight and Alex Lifeson's guitar playing was vastly improved from last year's Jock Harty appearance.

Not many three man bands could even attempt a show the size of Rush's. For the most part they were flawless and exciting in their execution. With better technical control especially the sound level, the show could have been a classic.

Dylan in TO: once more without feeling

by Bruce Stratton

Bob Dylan, visionary, mystic, and above all poet, has laid down the torch which led so many protests and has lifted high a mirrored ball. For as his stolid and artificial performance in Toronto last Thursday made clear, Disco Dylan is here to stay.

The performance began with Dylan in the dressing room. His eight man band took the stage to perform a very tight and very smooth instrumental version of "My Back Pages." Dylan then emerged to sing "Love in Vain" from his "Street Legal" album. This first song indicated that perhaps the Dylan of old had not completely vanished. He sounded as nasal and as off key as ever. Despite the fact that the back-up band would have sounded more at home behind Jackson Browne than behind Dylan, it seemed that once they got loosened up things would begin to cook.

Like the proverbial watched pot, however, Dylan and his band failed to produce. Although he sang such powerful and evocative songs as "Ballad of a Thin Man," "It Ain't Me, Babe," and "All Along the Watchtower," Dylan was content to merely mouth the words. Gone was the vehemence so characteristic of his earlier work. Instead he delivered a slick "product," repeat with sax breaks and conga solos.

To be fair it must be noted that Dylan's band put aside its California styled riffs for a more than adequate treatment of "Masters of War." "Tangled Up in Blue" was also a standout. Dylan, bathed in red light and flanked by a pianist and saxophonist, gave a poignant rendition of one of his strongest love ballads. Lamentably, however, moments such as these were few and far between.

The entire mood of the concert was exemplified best by "Like a Rolling Stone." When Dylan did this song with The Band or The Rolling Thunder Revue audiences would invariably be on their feet, cheering. Last Thursday in Toronto 16,000 people tapped their toes.

Goin' South latest vehicle for dual talents of Jack Nicholson

by Mark Henderson

Goin' South is 100% Jack Nicholson, marking his first performance in over 2 years and his second attempt at directing ever. One of the few Westerns to be released in recent years, Goin' South doesn't attempt anything new or radical, but succeeds through its unpretentious efforts to simply entertain. Nicholson plays a veteran from the civil war, condemned to hang for bank robbery and horse stealing. Saved in the nick of time by a young woman who pledges to marry him; she utilizes an obscure law which allows a woman from the community to commute the death penalty through marriage. The film starts rather confusingly, and it isn't until they settle onto the woman's homestead/goldmine and start to get to know each other that the plot gains direction and cinematic cohesion.

Many tried and true plot devices are used to good effect in Goin' South, placing it squarely within the Western genre tradition. There are Nicholson's former outlaw-friends who return to disrupt his new-found lifestyle, the encroaching railroad from the past, in cahoots with a cold and calculating banker who takes the wife's land away, and the ultimate escape to Mexico rejecting the contradictions and inequalities of American frontier life. This last aspect of Goin' South is similar in many ways to one of Sam Peckinpah's recurring themes - escape to Mexico as a final desperate effort to find new direction in life - and Nicholson (as director) seems to be paying homage to the great perpetrator of American pessimism and disillusionment. In Goin' South though, Mexico is not seen in a negative context, but one in which the couple can enjoy the gold which is rightfully theirs. In fact, most of the movie is quite funny and Nicholson (as actor) plays his role to the hilt. With unkempt beard and hair, he squints, grins, and jumps about in an outrageous manner that occasionally reminds one of his performance in Cuckoo's Nest.

The main body of the film deals with Nicholson and his new wife (played by newcomer Mary Steenburgen) as they embark on a new direction in their respective lives, and search for gold in an old mine inherited from the wife's father. Many of the scenes are quietly touching as both search for peace of mind and gradually fall in love. Many humorous situations occur along the way, de-emphasizing the harsh realities of rural life. She wants to strike gold and move east to Philadelphia, while his aspirations are to go south to Mexico and begin a new life there. Nicholson shows a growing understanding of the nature of film direction and Goin' South is totally different from his first directorial effort, Drive, He Said (1971) which dealt with student radicalism and the unfortunate necessity to compromise with the system or be rejected by it. While Drive, He Said was a bitter statement of the dying idealism of the 1960's, Goin' South has a warmth and charm which makes it well worth seeing. I only hope that Nicholson will continue to make this sort of film, as it suits his eccentric acting abilities and sharp humour, and tries in its unassuming way to be nothing more than pleasant, well made entertainment.

Note for John Belushi fans: Belushi has a small role portraying a Mexican deputy, befitting his minute capabilities as an actor and comedian.

Craft exhibit opens

by Madeline Mills

In the Upper Edge Gallery of the Canadian Shop on Princess St there is an exhibition of the work of four craftsmen: fiber pieces such as wall hangings and woven pots are the work of Rosemary Chapman and Peter Honeywell, wooden boxes with decoupage leaves are by Lucille Pancyr and leather boxes and sculpture were made by David Trotter.

"Functional things can be beautiful", Lucille Pancyr stated. In Canada, crafts have not stayed in the pioneer tradition, in the last fifteen years there has been a revolution in the field which has tied it to literature, Art History and the arts of other cultures. Functional objects have been made into art pieces.

Pancyr, Chapman and Honeywell are from Ottawa and they are trying to start their own multi-media guild there. There are strong weaver and potter guilds in the city but these three artists wanted a group that would include various types of crafts so that a more interesting exchange of ideas could take place. Their own store is operated without the aid of a middleman and the prices asked reflect what the artist thinks it is worth. Their shop is a sort of 'co-op': they pool their time and the rent. "No one would operate our shop with our level of profit", Chapman explained, "we make so little that we have to band together to stay afloat. You couldn't make the sort of crafts we make if you remained by yourself because if you had one lean month you'd have to fold." The integrity of the three Ottawa artists is as admirable as their work.

Titcomb captivates fans with folk versatility

by Colin Hunt

Coffee houses are more than just way-stations for folkies who can't make it commercially; they are musical emporiums where a wide variety of talent is presented. The diversity of Scarecrow was demonstrated last weekend with the performance of Brent Titcomb.

Titcomb's musical arrangements are oddities in themselves in the world of folk music. With his back-up man, Tom Graham, he is capable of quiet, mellow tunes such as "Flow on the River", adding a touch of heavy metal to old classics such as "Sing High Sing Low", or the orchestration of haunting, eerie songs like "Cassandra", an old Bob Carpentier composition. He does not restrict himself to one interpretation of a song either, as his rendition of "By the Rivers of Babylon" contained repeated ad lib guitar solos and duets.

Titcomb's sphere of activity seems to have expanded in recent years, as he had just returned to Canada from a tour in Hawaii. His plans in the immediate future include the formation of a five-man band, drawing instrumentalists from Chilikwak and Jackson Hawke and, the possibility of a second album.

The opener for the evening was performed by Andy Rush, a talented guitarist specializing in hitchhiking songs. Andy was a little nervous at first and a rattle of one of his timing screws didn't help matters. Nonetheless, he gave good renditions of John Sebastian "The Younger Generation" and Donovan's "I'll Try for the Sun". Andy's own compositions show strong jazz overtones, particularly in his tune "Thoughts".

If one ever had to pick a time to attend Scarecrow, last week was probably the best. Titcomb's rapport with his audience, large or small, is nearly the greatest I have ever seen. It is impossible not to respond to his jokes, his antics and above all his music. The only regrets this writer had were that it ended all too soon.

Gaels' secondary sparks victory

by Tim Turnbull

Superior size and timely interceptions enabled the Golden Gaels football team to defeat the Carleton Ravens 26-3, on a wet, blustery day at George Richardson Memorial Stadium.

The win, fifth in a row, assures the Gaels of at least a tie for first place in the OQIFC-Eastern division. But it took a strong defensive effort and the solid offensive strength to outmuscle the Ravens on a muddy field before a large Homecoming crowd.

Standouts for the Gaels were halfback Tony Manastersky, who skillfully followed his blocking for 91 yards on 16 carries; and the defensive backfield, particularly Ted Tyczka and Jim D'Andrea, who between them picked off five errant Carleton passes.

The Gaels dominated first quarter play, as Tyczka intercepted quarterback Mark Lee's first pass of the game at the 15 second mark. Last year, Lee tried the same strategy against the Gaels and that pass too, was intercepted by Tyczka. The offence had some problems moving against a Carleton defence that was stacked against the run and could not score.

The Gaels drew first blood following a missed 37 yard field goal by Brad Thompson. A fumble on the ensuing runback was pounced on by guard John Wilson. Quarterback Bob Mullen then threw a beautiful 19 yard pass to Manastersky, who made an amazing one-hand grab for the touchdown.

In the second quarter the Gaels marched 80 yards through the muck for another touchdown, this time on a 3 yard blast by Dave Marinucci behind John Wilson's block. Mullen mixed his plays well, as the Gaels displayed some excellent ball control.

After Jim D'Andrea's interception, Brad Thompson kicked a 31 yard single following a missed field goal. Carleton's only threatening field position occurred with three minutes left in the half, as Plishka's snap sailed over punter Tim Wardrop's head. The Queen's defence stiffened and Ross Francis blocked a 22 yard field goal attempt by Rob Gaskell. Gaels led 15-0 at the half.

Both teams were literally bogged down in the second half. The stiff breeze forced the Gaels to kick field goals into the wind in order to get any carry, since punts were ineffective. Carleton started to come back, as Mark Lee began to find his receivers. After a good 60 yard drive, Rob Gaskell kicked a 17 yard field goal.

The fourth quarter saw a sudden rejuvenation of the Gaels. After suffering from poor field position in the third quarter, the Gaels finally moved the ball with the help of a couple of interceptions.

Tony Manastersky fumbled on the Queen's 27 yard line, giving Carleton an excellent scoring opportunity. But safety Ted Tyczka, who had actually been beaten on the play, snared Lee's pass on the goal line and returned it to midfield. The entire team and the half-frozen spectators came alive.

The Gaels picked up a single on a 55 yard kick by Tim Wardrop (following a huge bounce) and a 27 yard field goal by Brad Thompson (after a Carleton fumble) at the 9:50 mark.

In the closing minutes, defensive captain Jim D'Andrea went to town, intercepting two passes deep in the Gaels end. Earlier in the game, D'Andrea had gone for the interception on a short pass to the flat and was burned. He atoned for that error by latching onto the ball on exactly the same play and rambling 85 yards for the touchdown with only 27 second left on the clock.

The Gaels did not destroy Carleton, but the team played solidly in the poor conditions and clearly took advantage of any turnovers. Keeping the ball on the ground, Manastersky, Marinucci and Mullen rolled up 182 yards, compared to Carleton's 106. Mullen was successful on 7 of 15 pass attempts for 95 yards and one interception. His counterpart Mark Lee was good on 10 of 24 for 116 yards, but threw five interceptions.

This Saturday the Gaels travel to Lennoxville, Quebec, to meet the Bishop Gaels. As Bishop's has a 4-1 record, following a 52-0 pounding of Concordia, the Gaels must win if they want first place and the home field advantage in the playoffs. After watching their gritty performance Saturday, you know that they will be ready for Bishop's.

Challenge for Track

by Paul Tinari

On Saturday October 21st, 1978, Queen's will host the Ontario Universities Athletic Association (OUAA) Track and Field meet at the George Richardson Memorial Stadium. The Queen's track Gaels are entering the competition as defending champions from the 1977 OUAA meet which was held at McMaster.

Last fall, the coaches saw a fall season of hard work pay off as P. Beche took the long jump, D. Card burned ahead in the 100 and 200, V. Gooding won the 400, and Bob ("Doc") McCormack doubled in the 800, and 1500. As a result of these and many other outstanding efforts, the victorious Queen's team took home, for the first time in its history, the Tait McKenzie Trophy, beating out the University of Toronto 190 points to 166.

This year the team and coaches are optimistic, as the athletes have demonstrated great depth in many of the events. Card is back again for a stab at the 100 and 200, and Wilson appears well prepared for the 200 and 400. Morrison is Queen's brightest hope in the hurdle events (110 & 400H) and Hitchen has clearly demonstrated his track-melting speed in the 400 and the 800. In the distance events, Shoemaker, who has been training extremely hard since the Commonwealth Trials, is given excellent chances in the 5000. In the field events, Steve Warning, having already set a new Queen's high-jump record at 6'6", is certain to soar to new heights in the quest for gold, and Beche is bound to be an eye-catcher in the long and triple jumps. There may be some impressive performances from the Pole vaulting squad as well.

The coaches appear pleased with the team's progress. They have worked very hard to prepare the athletes for the coming meet, and are to be greatly commended for their efforts. Support by members of the Queen's community would certainly be a great asset to the athletes, and would be much appreciated, as the 21 member squad is bound to encounter stiff opposition from the 16 other university teams attending. Meet starts at 10:30 a.m. and is expected to go to 4:30 in the afternoon.

Big tourneys for field hockey

by Vicki Newbury

Both the Intermediate and senior Queen's Field Hockey teams have recently been preparing for their major tournaments of the season. They compete for the championship this weekend at U of T's Scarborough College and next weekend at York University.

The Senior team had a chance last Tuesday to learn some of their weaknesses, in a game against St. Lawrence College from New York. The American team defeated the Gaels 2-0, taking advantage of a general lack of unified play.

As a whole, the team has come together and is now looking very strong. The over-all aggressive style of play, especially that of center forward Bev Koski, will be a strong factor in the team's success over the next two weeks.

Valuable Senior CF, Bev Koski.

by Mark Pentland

Over five hundred participants ran, jogged and in some cases cart-wheeled their way through the two and a half mile Harrier last Tuesday night. Meds emerged the champions with four runners placing in the top ten finishers. Bob McCormack again demonstrated his prowess in the "long" distance events, however Kevin Titus (PHE) pressed Bob all the way to the finish. Some of the Mechanical men enjoyed the event so much that they were seen still running their way back to the Phys. Ed Centre, two hours later!

Indoor softball defending champs MBA have split their first two games, while third ranked Mining are 2 and 0, following a convincing 10-0 win over Chemical. PHE and Meds appear to be the teams to beat, with Commerce 79 showing impressive batting in a 17-1 victory over Electrical.

Mechanical and defending champs Chemical appear to be dominating the Soccer league. Both posted early season victories in competition last week.

It is early in the season for all of the outdoor sports, so predictions in those sports will have to come later this week. However, with the Broomball schedule starting yesterday, Mining will attempt to retain their championship title. It may be a little premature, but I would predict at this time that Commerce 79 may be the team to beat in Broomball this year.

Villeneuve: first Canadian to win a Grand Prix

Formula 1- Auto Racing at its best

by Geoff Whittaker

Sunday, October 8th, was a day for Canadians to remember. For the past twelve years Canada has played host to Formula One drivers from around the world, in the annual Canadian Grand Prix, but until last Sunday, had never managed to come up with a champion from within its own ranks. Gilles Villeneuve has changed all more than 70,000 people.

"To win a Grand Prix race is one thing," Villeneuve said, "but to win your first Grand Prix at home is completely unthinkable."

As soon as Villeneuve completed the victory lap and entered the pits, crowds of people stormed past security guards and on to the track. A ten foot steel fence beside the track was pushed down by cheering Canadians as they ran towards the pits. Villeneuve finally appeared on top of the pit building to be seen by the masses of people, most of whom were French-Canadian. As the people squeezed tightly to the pit and track area they chanted, "Villeneuve, Villeneuve" over and over again.

Villeneuve was later congratulated by Pierre Trudeau, who had arrived by helicopter just 30 minutes prior to the race. Villeneuve was awarded his trophy after opening an oversized beer bottle presented by Labatt's Breweries who sponsored the race.

The first 49 laps of the race were led by Frenchman Jean-Pierre Jarier in a Lotus. Jarier qualified fastest time on Saturday's qualifications which gave him front row position on the grid. He quickly achieved a large lead from the other cars. But eventually Jarier was forced to quit with a hole in his radiator caused by a flying stone.

At that time he had a 30 second lead on the number twelve Ferrari driven by Villeneuve. Villeneuve had just previously moved up from fourth to second passing Alan Jones of Australia in the Williams car and South African Jody Scheckter driving the Canadian owned Walter Wolf car.

Jean-Pierre Jarier of France led the race in a Lotus until the 50th lap when he was forced to retire (above). Below, Villeneuve in his number 12 Ferrari leads the pack to his eventual win.

Villeneuve took the lead with a 30 second gap between him and the second place car of Scheckter. Scheckter eventually brought the Canadian car home to second place.

"To win a Grand Prix race is one thing, but to win your first Grand Prix at home is unthinkable."

13.3 seconds behind Villeneuve.

After Villeneuve took the lead he thought that something wrong was bound to happen.

"I kept saying to myself, Ferrari is the best car Ferrari is the best car. It doesn't break, it never breaks." The week before, Villeneuve had an engine blow while he was holding second place in the US Grand Prix at Watkins Glen. Ferrari is noted for being the most reliable Formula One car and for an engine to blow is quite uncommon. So Villeneuve knew, as he said later, that once you blow a Ferrari engine you know it won't happen twice.

Carlos Reutemann of Argentina, Villeneuve's teammate, placed his Ferrari third. Reutemann had won the US Grand Prix the week before. So with two new wins for Ferrari, they became second in the Constructors International Cup for 1978. They bumped the Brabham Alfas down to third. Lotus Ford won the cup this year.

This year's world champion Mario Andretti from the US placed tenth in his Lotus. He started ninth, in the middle of the grid, and had an accident with John Watson of Ireland (Brabham) in the first few laps of the race. Andretti was able to continue but Watson had to retire on lap 1. Three previous world champions ended up watching the end of the race, Niki Lauda of Austria (twice world champion) driving the other Brabham retired on lap 1 with mechanical troubles. Brazilian Emerson Fittipaldi (twice) crashed at the start and James Hunt of England (McLaren) went out on lap 51 with car troubles.

This year the Canadian Grand Prix was the last race out of 16 races. It was a great end of the season for Canada and it couldn't have gone any better with a Canadian driver getting the win and a Canadian car winning second place.

Blame shared by all

Last Wednesday, ten students were convicted in Provincial Court of bootlegging. The total of all fines and confiscated beer came to $4,700. The court made the only possible decision in its sentence, though the implications for ten students, most of whom are paying their own way through university, are severe.

It is important to look back to the incident itself. On September 14, in the middle of Orientation week, Kingston Police raided two student parties, and arrested eleven persons allegedly involved in the sale of beer. $1,600 in beer was confiscated at that time.

The raids, surprisingly, were not precipitated by complaints arising out of these two parties. Chief of Police Gerald Rice ordered the raids because of other, unrelated student activities over the previous four nights. It is noteworthy that just the previous day an outdoor dance had elicited over 100 complaints from Kingston citizens. It is also significant that Mayor Ken Keyes had admitted speaking to Rice about the incident just hours before Rice began planning the raid, based on information supplied in good faith by the AMS Orientation Committee.

Clearly, then, the raids were not directed at the activities of the students holding the party. All students were the target, Rice felt an example had to be set.

Hence, all students, through the AMS Outer Council, should bear the financial burden. $4,700 is a large sum by anyone's standards; for it to be borne by ten students when all share the blame is simply unfair.

AMS Outer Council should set aside a token sum as its contribution, and then should sponsor a fund-raising campaign to help the convicted students. This is not to imply that Council disputes the court's decision. It is merely to acknowledge that all students share the blame, and hence all students should share the punishment.

Weekend to recover from

Homecoming can be literally construed as a return home for the hundreds of Queen's grads who arrive after a leave of absence for whatever number of years. When people live and grow at a school for three or more years, one cannot help but begin to think of it as home. Upon looking back at these days the good memories grow fonder with the passage of time. Similarly the bad memories gradually diminish.

Consequently, the fall reunion is not only a time to exchange news with old buddies but also a time to renew an acquaintance with another old friend, Queen's itself. It is more than the campus and buildings to which the alumni feel kinship, but the students as well. We are proof of the continuing vitality and spirit of the University they once attended, and obviously still believe in. And as such we can make their return a happy one, and a time for refreshing those fond memories.

There certainly were times this weekend when this link between students of old and new was apparent, the alumni-student blind date being one example. Another occurred at the football game after the second Queen's touchdown. Taking their cue from the mass of swaying and singing student bodies across Richardson stadium, alumni began to rise one at a time and then en-masse to perform their own oil thigh. Unfortunately these experiences were marred by a few instances of excessive inebriation capped off by a drunken student shinning up a light post during the game.

However Homecoming this year will be remembered as it always is: a time for reunions with good friends and a weekend to recover from. The Queen's spirit lives on.

Rector: ceremony or utility

Moe Chochla resigned from his position as Rector of Queen's last week, and the election of his successor will soon be underway.

While this position does not hold a high profile in the Queen's community, it is undoubtedly an important one for the student body. With his unique freedom the Rector can defend what he perceives as the best interests of the students without paying homage to any particular one group on campus.

However, along with this mobility comes a greater responsibility for the individual elected. There is little control over the rector once he assumes office and the position can easily revert to the totally ceremonial title it once was.

In his two year term Chochla continued to enlarge the status and influence of the job, by his dedicated work on a score of committees into which students have little input.

Hopefully, students will carefully consider their choice for his successor.

Tidiness and efficiency motive for Café change

by Warren Everson and Sean Dewart

The decision to install the much criticized new seats in the Sidewalk Café was made solely to increase efficiency and tidiness, according to John Deutsch Centre Manager, Norm Hart, and the Director of Purchasing and Food Services, R. C. Webb.

"We weren't thinking of turnover at all," said Hart, "we're not worried about people lingering in the coffee shop. Our main consideration was simply to keep the floor cleaner and avoid the congestion."

Webb did say that the change "makes it easier to get more through." He added that the University Management Committee had approved the change, and that increased profits would revert not to Saga, but back to the university.

Minutes of the Management committee meeting in which the idea was voted on indicate, however, that the move was refused by the committee, because the first priority for funds was to be the central meeting area.

John Koopman and Cord Howe, both of whom voted at the meeting, claim that the primary reason for the committee's refusal was as a result of the new seats' appearance. "They looked like a MacDonald's" was their comment.

Howe, a former AMS vice president, said "at least three members of the five-man committee agreed that the proposed new seats were totally unsuitable."

Koopman verified this comment, adding that the new seats "have destroyed the theme of Sidewalk Café. It's impossible, he asserted, to enjoy a cup of coffee. In the Users Committee Report for the planning of the John Deutsch Centre it was recommended that the cafeteria should provide the obvious, but should also be a place where people meet and talk... an appropriate complement to the Centre."

The management spokesmen refused to disclose the cost of the new seating system, but Koopman has told the Journal that the original plan presented to the Management Committee was between eight and ten thousand dollars.

Both Webb and Hart justify the expense during this period of cut-backs by explaining that the tidiness and efficiency would make the expense a financially wise move.

Regardless of the management's satisfaction with the new arrangement, student protest has been considerable. Wednesday, Outer Council tabled a motion for later consideration, to boycott the café in protest of the new seats.

A flood this week forced closure of controversial café: an omeat (erland)

AMS shows support "in spirit" for fined students

by Rob Southcott

AMS Outer Council passed a motion this Tuesday accepting the principle of collective responsibility in the circumstances which led to the conviction of ten students on October 12 regarding charges of bootlegging.

Council accepted the position that the police action against the students, in the midst of Orientation Week, was taken as "a result of a number of Orientation Week activities over the previous four days."

A second motion, calling for AMS endorsement of a fund-raising campaign, was not allowed by the speaker, on the grounds that a similar motion had already been defeated.

Tom Mohr, who introduced the two motions, was pleased by the result.

"Council accepts the principle of collective responsibility. Though it was disinclined to translate that into an endorsement of a fund-raising campaign, they have, at the very least, shown their support in spirit."

Reaction to the first motion was mixed, with AMS President Dave Brown and AMS External Affairs Commissioner Hugh Dodd opposing it on the grounds that it would adversely affect relations between students and the city.

Some Council members feared the motion would effectively condone illegal activities.

The first motion was supported by Internal Affairs Commissioner Richard Binhammer, who said, "This shifts some of the blame onto all of us, instead of making examples out of ten people."

Who's Where booo

Staff - This year's Who's Where has regrettably announced that there is a booo in the book. The index entitled "Where To Find Things in the Book" does not tell students where to find things in the book.

The typesetter, editor Chris Chenoweth reported, had re-numbered the Who's Where pages and moved them around in sequence. Unfortunately, the typesetter forgot to re-number the index listings.

So, if you turn to pages 4 & 5, don't expect to make any sense out of the index.

The staff of the "Who's Where" apologizes to the "entire student body" for the error, and hopes it will not cause excessive inconvenience.

Quest: on target

by John Philp

Queen's Quest, the fund-raising drive targeted to raise ten million dollars over five years, has already received pledges amounting to twenty-five percent of its goal. James Courtwright, vice-principal for Development and Information, has announced that Queen's Quest has received 7.5 million dollars in pledges only ten months after its official kickoff.

To date, only 2.3 million dollars have been received. The remainder of the 7.5 million is expected to come in at regular intervals over the remainder of the five year drive. Of the $100,000 pledged by parents of Queen's students $50,000 have been received. Corporations have pledged $3,300,000 of which $700,000 has already been received. Alumni have pledged $900,000 of which $300,000 has been received. Private foundations have contributed $700,000 and pledged $800,000 more. Queen's Quest has collected $160,000 from the estates of Queen's benefactors. The Board of Trustees has contributed $190,000 and students have pledged $750,000 over a ten year period of which $75,000 will be paid this year.

The student contribution was determined in the spring referendum of 1978. Courtwright claims that the students are "getting their money back pretty fast." The money collected by Queen's Quest goes to Student Aid, Library facilities, visiting professors, equipment and other services that directly deal with student needs. Courtwright also said that he hopes that few students will exercise their right to opt out of the contribution.

Some corporations have pledged amounts proportional to the total amount collected by Queen's Quest. These pledges will be called for only when all other pledges have been collected.

The success of Queen's Quest will depend on the ability to collect on pledges made. Pledges are not a

Frosh week damages

The A.M.S. is currently trying to decide what course to take on three outstanding damages claims, remaining from frosh week. Two of these are damages to cars; the third is a broken window.

Paul Sobanski, Chairman of the Orientation Committee is unwilling to give any information about the claims until he has all the facts and has investigated fully each incident.

Damages which occur during frosh week deal mostly with cars. However, these damages as well as others to Kingstonians' property do not end when frosh week ends. Dave Brown, President of the A.M.S., stated last week, "My phone's always ringing off the hook. I get about one call every week from a Kingston resident who has a complaint. If someone walks across their lawn, they call me. There's not much I can really do except apologize on behalf of the students." Bylaw 11 of the A.M.S. Constitution outlines clearly how damages are to be paid for. If the individuals responsible can be identified, they shall pay the damages. If only the individuals' faculty is known, then that faculty society shall pay the costs. Lastly, if neither the individuals responsible nor their faculty are known, then the total amount assessed shall be paid jointly by A.S.U.S., the Commerce Society, and the Engineering Society in amounts proportional to the number of freshmen enrolled in each society's program.

As of yet, no individuals have been identified nor has any faculty with respect to the three damages still outstanding from frosh week. If investigations prove to find no further information, the last recourse will apply.

"Geography of hope"

Justice Berger to lecture

by Trish Crowe

Mr. Justice Berger, commissioner of the MacKenzie Valley Pipeline Inquiry, will give a lecture at Queen's on Monday, October 23 on the Geography of Hope.

Berger, a graduate of the University of British Columbia, was called to the Bar of British Columbia in 1957. He practised law in Vancouver from 1957 to 1971, when he was made Judge of the Supreme Court of British Columbia.

Before his appointment to the Bench, Berger had represented native groups in asserting their hunting, fishing and aboriginal rights in cases before the court.

In 1973, the B.C. government named him Chairman of the Royal Commission on Family and Children's Law. The fragmented aspects of family law were brought together in one institutional framework as a result of this mandate.

During his term as Commissioner of the MacKenzie Valley Pipeline Inquiry, Berger conducted hearings across northern and southern Canada, and heard from over five hundred witnesses on the environmental, social and cultural effects which a pipeline would have on the north.

Berger last spoke at Queen's in November 1975, as a guest speaker in the Corry Lecture series.

His speech on Monday evening will take place in Dunning Auditorium.

goal of the programme designed to raise funds for capital expenditures was $6.5 million. These programmes take work, planning and time. Queen's Quest was two years in the planning stage and, by the time the last pledge is collected the campaign will have gone on for well over seven years.

Courtright explained that Queen's has learned from experience, that "you have to ask for money".

As fares rise, student dissatisfaction steadily grows.

Beat taxi rates

[Staff - The 60% increase in the taxi fare from downtown Kingston to the CN train station is forcing students to find alternative means of transportation. The new $4.50 fare represents half the price of a train ticket to Ottawa.

The only alternative to a taxi is to take the PUC bus to the city limits and then walk the remaining distance to the station, at a total cost of 35c and one hour of your time. Unfortunately, PUC buses do not run on Sundays, so students returning to Kingston have little choice but to pay the fare.

Taxi driver Doug Robinson of Amherstview Taxi agrees that the new fare system has made the cost of a taxi ridiculously high. Consequently, he has found a legal method of beating the system. He plans to distribute coupons much like those distributed by food stores, which will provide a discount of

$1.50 on the price of a trip across the city boundaries. These tickets should soon be available around the campus.

However, there are ways to reduce the fare still further. According to a city by-law, up to three passengers may travel together for the same fare, provided they share a common origin and destination. So, when you get off the train, find one or two other Queen's students (identifiable by a knapsack full of books) and compromise with them on a mutual drop-off point so that you may split the cost of the cab among you. However, unless you inform the driver that the three of you are travelling together and plan to share the cost of the ride, he is legally entitled to charge each one of you separately.

As an afterthought, be sure to carry your luggage with you in the cab, or the driver can charge you a 50c handling fee.

Watts emphasizes commitment to quality

by Jo-Anne Stead

Principal Watts University Day speech delivered Monday covered a wide spectrum of problems and solutions that Queen's will be faced with in the near future.

The principal began with the history of the university and Queen's determination in pulling through the rougher times. Queen's in the 19th century survived a number of crises he said, especially financial ones. Principal Watts was especially proud of the "pioneering role which this university has occupied in higher education in Canada."

The similarity between the problems that Queen's has faced in the past and those she faces in the near future recalls the familiar quotation of, "history repeats itself." The problems that Queen's will have to face in the future concern the change in the pattern of enrollment and the reduced budget.

"A severe decline in undergraduate enrollment during the 1980's to a level possibly 25% below current levels" was predicted in the Ontario Council on University Affairs reports. In reference to this, Watts stated that, "In relation to enrollment trends, Queen's is in one of the strongest positions in the country."

The other difficulty that the OCUA reported was "the stated desire of the Government of Ontario to balance its Budget through expenditure restraint." The OCUA has concluded that severe expenditure restrictions will be unavoidable in the universities during the years ahead. Some of the restraints will be noticeable in "a reduction across the province by 1981-82 of possibly some 1,300 faculty positions."

Watts responded to these predictions by explaining that "Comparative data indicates that among the universities of Ontario we continue to spend less proportionately of the operating budget upon administrative and non-academic support services, to spend more on instruction and academic support services and to maintain, despite inevitable erosion due to financial pressures, one of the lowest overall student-staff ratios."

There were a few areas that Watts felt were of prime importance in planning Queen's future: "We must maintain and reinforce our reputation for quality and constructiveness... we must do all we can to reinforce the financial support of the University from the private sector... and most important of any strategy is the need for us to maintain a positive and constructive attitude towards the task of overcoming the problems ahead."

Can women come into their own in a male-dominated environment?

Women second class?

by Janet Brick

Women have a negative self-image, and unless they change it, they will continue to be discriminated against by the male dominated university community. This was only one of the ideas that emerged at Tuesday evening's panel discussion of 'Women and the University'. The focus of the discussion was 'What Now and What Next?'

All present agreed that women should be more active and aggressive. They must work together to change their status as second class citizens, and while this change can be initiated in the university environment, it must also be extended to the labour force.

Advice to female undergraduates ranged from "Learn the System", from Anne Arsenault, who is currently teaching at St. Lawrence College, to "Unless You Are Independently Wealthy, Get Out" from Elinor Mahoney, A.M.S. researcher Jo Vellacott, a history professor at Queen's, expressed the most widely accepted attitude that women can change their status.

Simon back in Canada, new visa in hand

by Tim Greenwood

Andy Simon, the student entertainer who voluntarily left Canada rather than face a deportation hearing is now back at Queen's. He was granted a student visa the day after his arrival in the U.S. However he was penalized by being denied access to a work visa for the next two years.

The entire incident, which resulted from Simon's playing a paying engagement at the Firehall restaurant without an official work visa, has left the young man angry and bitter. He said, in a recent interview, that the infraction was inadvertent and unintentional, and occurred at a time when he was perplexed by financial difficulties.

Simon's sentencing emerged from a short interview in which he was denied legal counsel and which he characterized as "simplistic and intimidating." "She interviewed me, decided I was guilty and then laid sentence," he said. Simon felt a legal representative "could have gotten across my situation in a more logistical style."

Simon felt the procedure following the interview was arbitrary and absurd, citing his being granted a student visa the day after leaving Canada as an example of this. He added that he knew of another foreign entertainer who was told by Manpower he did not need special clearance simply because he was playing with a Canadian.

"The immigration act for students and entertainers has been flip-flopped in the past couple of years. There are other musicians in the same predicament," said Simon.

Simon, intends with legal assistance, to re-apply for a work visa but he feels his chances of success are slim. He is also assessing the possibility of booking engagements in U.S. border cities like Alexandria Bay where he could legally play, being an American citizen.

Simon, who has a musical background of twelve years of classical violin, only began to consider playing professionally late last year. Queen's Best was an encouraging experience for him and over the summer he worked on his music. "My dream was slowly becoming a reality," he said. "I was on top of the world - then bang, no more. Now I see the opportunities taking other people's way."

Though currently unable to perform for financial remuneration, Simon plans to continue playing. He has a guest set at Scarecrow in the upcoming weeks.

Nuclear power needed, Uffen contends

by Paul Finkel

We have "barely enough time" to make major decisions about nuclear development in Ontario, according to Dr. R. J. Uffen, Dean of Applied Science and Vice Chairman of the Board of Directors of Ontario Hydro.

Speaking to the Association of Professional Engineers last Thursday evening, Uffen cited nuclear power as "the bridging technology for the next twenty-five years" and said Ontario must have this power source in service by 1992-95.

However, "the planning of a reactor takes approximately fourteen years, seven of those years from the time you have committed yourself to the building," he said. This means "the fateful decision" about development, "which you cannot back off from without considerable consequence and expense, must be made in the next six to ten years," he added.

The major developmental problem concerns the effective disposal of radioactive wastes which consist of bundles of spent (used) fuel rods taken from the reactor core. Dr. Uffen, speaking about his one year independent study on "The Disposal of Ontario Used Nuclear Fuel," presented to the Porter Commission and to the House of Commons, said he investigated the possibility of constructing interim storage facilities. These facilities would house the spent fuel rods for forty to fifty years while it was decided whether to recycle the wastes or dispose of them permanently.

In Ontario, these fuel rods are presently stored underwater in spent fuel bays which resemble large swimming pools. It has been necessary to construct additional bays beyond the reactor sites to accommodate the existing 73,000 used fuel bundles.

"The problem," said Uffen, "is the accumulation of these bundles, which will number between 2-4 million by the year 2,000, thus making effective disposal a problem we must solve in our lifetime."

Uffen noted that recycling seems sensible but that the process extracts products such as plutonium which can be misused.

"Governments, terrorists, you name it, could use this plutonium for nefarious purposes such as making bombs," he said. Canada, U.S.A., U.S.S.R., U.K. and China have already recycled plutonium for nuclear weapons, he added.

His report recommended that no commitment be made to reprocessing spent fuel until it could be proven technologically safe, economically desirable and sociologically acceptable.

Discussing long term storage of nuclear wastes, Dr. Uffen told the group that permanent storage is presently possible, and is a question of time, money, and public acceptance. The spent fuel rods could be sealed in igneous rock formation in the Canadian Shield. The containment of radioactive materials in rock formations has occurred in Nature and such a formation has been discovered in Africa and studied to see the effects of the process over time.

"Because it happened once in Nature, the hypothesis is that maybe men can emulate this process and improve it," said Uffen, who also stated that this method of disposal is not problem free.

"Geologists know an awful lot about the past, but don't know a lot about predicting the nature of rocks in the future." The radioactive fuel rods generate a great deal of heat, so, "we are dealing with temperatures we've never measured in rocks," he added.

The accumulation of spent fuel rods cannot be stopped by simply halting the construction of new nuclear plants. "If a moratorium on new power plants were called tomorrow," said Uffen, "we would still be accumulating spent fuel rods and would, by the end of the century, have over one million of them."

He explained that there would not be sufficient power to provide us for our peak energy loads if all existing nuclear plants were closed. "People who call for a moratorium are misguided

New Botterell Hall

Botterell is honoured

by Sheila Croft

Dr. E. Harry Botterell, after whom the newly constructed Botterell Hall of Queen's University was named, yesterday became recognized as an Officer in the Order of Canada.

The investiture took place at the Government House in Ottawa where Dr. Botterell was presented with his insignia of membership by Governor General Jules Léger, Chancellor of the Order.

Botterell is an acclaimed neurosurgeon and holds many memberships in professional societies and associations. He moved to Kingston in 1962 to take up the position of Professor of Surgical Neurology and Dean of the Faculty of Medicine at Queen's University. Later, he became Vice-principal of Health Sciences at Queen's, and was appointed Special Advisor to the Principal of Health Sciences.

The Order of Canada was created in 1967 to recognize Canadians who have performed outstanding achievement and service in every important field of endeavour.

AMS advocates student input into tenure decisions

by Beth McKenzie

The fight for student representation on the committees responsible for the hiring, renewal or tenure of faculty, received a major boost from the Outer Council of the AMS at its meeting on Tuesday.

Two motions, both of which were forwarded by AMS Vice-President Rory Cattanach and seconded by AMS President Dave Brown, were approved unanimously:

"Outer Council advocates that recommendations to the Department Head, Dean or Principal with respect to hiring, renewal or tenure should be made by committees rather than by consultation" and, "Outer Council strongly recommends student representation on all committees making recommendations on the hiring, renewal or tenure of faculty."

These issues are especially pertinent now as the Senate of Queen's University is presently revising the system of tenure which it adopted in April, 1969. This means that for the first time in several years students will have the opportunity to secure a full voting membership on all tenure committees, giving them a voice in the choice of professors and in the quality of the education which they receive.

New food co-operative promises dynamic duo: quality, low prices

by Liz McClung

An outlet for high quality, inexpensive food may soon be available to students and Kingston citizens.

The Kingston Social Planning Council is sponsoring a Food Co-operative for Kingston and the surrounding area. With the aid of a grant from the Canada Works Project, the Co-op intends to provide its members with good quality food at low prices.

The Food Co-op is a non-profit organization founded out of a concern for rising food costs, the degree of control over food distribution held by large corporations, and Kingston's economic health, an "extremely important consideration," according to organizers. It hopes to remedy, or at least lessen these problems, as well as to provide a center for social interaction by bringing people together. The organizers feel that "commitment to cooperation with our neighbours, to working together, is the binding force of healthy communities."

Aside from the obvious and important reason for forming a food co-op, that of saving the consumer money, there are others. A Food co-op would provide a focus for consumer action; it would offer the individual an active role in food provision, allow him to avoid impersonal and crowded supermarkets, and it would support local agriculture.

This is not an "order by bulk" co-op, although as yet no location has been found for the store. However, one of the organizers, Johanne Mednick, stated that in the near future, Co-op members will be able to "walk into the store, and find everything they need on the shelves."

On Oct. 26, an informal Educational Meeting at MacDonald School, for all those interested in learning more about the Co-op will be held. There will be discussions centering around food co-ops in general, and the question of whether a food co-op is feasible in Kingston. Organizers feel that "as long as there is enough active involvement from Kingston citizens and Queen's students, there is really no doubt about its feasibility."

The Food Co-op has heard from Science 44 Co-op, who expressed a great deal of interest in becoming members. The Co-op also hopes to have Elrond and John Orr Tower among its members, and they would "welcome any and all Queen's students." The success of the Food Co-op depends upon the active involvement of the community.

Fines call for show of unity

The Editor,

I find it hard not to use four-letter words to emphasize my disgust at the injustice reported under the headline: "Student Bootlegging Fines" in your Tuesday, October 17 edition. To fine each student $300 plus the cost of the beer, thus jeopardizing their ability to remain at Queen's, is ludicrous! I firmly believe we have a responsibility to those unjustly sentenced students (and to those who may find themselves in a similar position in the future,) to show that we are united, and that we will not let this unnecessary and destructive heavy-handedness go without protest. Get off your conservative ass, AMS, and organize a petition to raise the collective voice of Queen's against this blatant and indulgent show of power.

I have heard it said that Queen's people look after their own. Let's make this a reality and not just a catch-phrase.

students who were convicted of bootlegging.

In previous coverage by the Journal on this subject, there was little or no mention of precautions these students could have taken. Namely, for a nominal fee, a liquor license could have been obtained. Also, it is possible to arrange with the Kingston Police Dept. permission to have a street party (They may cordon off certain areas to provide safety for partying pedestrians.) It is evident that the aforementioned students did not know or did not care to know these facts.

We must stop to ask ourselves, two vital questions:

1. Did these students break the Law?
2. Have these students attained the age of majority?

Since there were a few hundred eye witnesses, not to mention a conviction in a court of law, we may assume that the answer to the first question is yes. As these students were from upper years, it is safe to assume that they have attained the age of majority (maturity?).

Attainment of the age of majority brings with it certain privileges (including the purchase and consumption of alcoholic beverages). However, these privileges carry with them responsibilities, such as suffering the consequences of wrong doing, as exemplified by the issue in question.

It was suggested in the editorial that the student body as a whole, should bear the blame and consequently, the penalty, for these students' actions. Does this not condone an illegal activity and assume that students have special rights over and above the average citizen? If these students are experiencing financial difficulties because of the fines that have been imposed, perhaps the AMS could extend a low interest loan, payable within a convenient period of time. However, the money should not be made available as an out and out gift. Sympathy and sentimentality are virtues except when they cloud our perception of reality.

It seems rather silly that these students would spend so much time and energy (reflected by the $1600 worth of beer on hand) and neglect the very important legal aspects involved.

Risk of fines may drive partyers into hibernation

Fined student sorry, but wiser

The Editor,

In your Journal article of Tuesday, October 17 ("Student Bootlegging Fines") I have been quoted as saying that "If I'd had the slightest idea that I was doing something wrong I never would have done it." While the rest of the article was factually correct, this statement needs clarification. Mr. Mohr has (unintentionally I'm sure) accredited the wrong person with this statement. Also, the statement has been lifted out of its original context and as a result, has been interpreted by some students as sounding unbelievably naive and highly self-righteous.

When we chose to have a party on September 14 the furthest thing from our minds was that we would soon be facing: 1.) arrest 2.) detention in jail cells 3.) thousands of dollars worth of fines and confiscations 4.) a possible prison term of four to six months. What the above statement was meant to convey (and which hopefully, other students will understand) was that had we known these would be the consequences, certainly we would not have considered having the party.

For years people have (without being arrested) been selling beer tickets at parties. This is not to say that the practise is "right". What we do want to say however, is that our shock at first being arrested and the anxiety which we felt after learning just how serious an offense we had committed should be understandable. Once the statement is put in this context we feel that most students would agree that throwing a Frosh Week party is simply not worth the risks involved.

Trudeau digging Liberals' grave

by Rob Reynolds

The mood of the country has turned ugly for Pierre Trudeau and the Natural Governing Party. In Monday's "mini-election" the Liberals lost in a big way being first past the post in only two ridings. (The P.C.'s won ten ridings, the N.D.P. two and the Social Credit one.)

The results of the "mini-election" have some very frightening implications for Canadian politics. Perhaps the most apparent result is the Liberals are becoming a party solely of Quebec. The failure of the Natural Governing Party to win outside of Quebec, despite the appearance of high profile candidates such as Dr. John Evans, Bryce Mackasey, Doris Anderson and Paul Cosgrove, illustrates English Canada's deep-rooted contempt for Pierre Trudeau. Moreover, the Liberal's defeat in St. Boniface, a traditional stronghold with a large francophone population, may attest to regional interests overcoming linguistic differences.

The mini-election does lead one to believe that the Conservatives may sweep back in a Diefenbaker manner. What the results don't necessarily imply is a swing to the right in this country. The Tories, as the Official Opposition are, simply, the logical choice of people registering an anti-Trudeau vote.

Although one could group the N.D.P. victory in Newfoundland in the "let's-get-Pierre" group, this is probably not the case. The NDP have presented cogent positions on economic and social issues consistently since their inception as a party. Their carefully reasoned policy regarding an industrial strategy for Pierre shares in thrill of victory before own agony of defeat!

Canada stands in stark contrast to the unsuccessful (under) development schemes of the provincial Conservative and federal Liberals for that part of Canada.

Not all look at the by-elections, as being indicative of the mood of the nation. Indeed, one political wizard, Geoffrey Stevens of the Globe and Mail, argues that, "it's unreasonable to project by-election results onto a general election." However, these were not one or two isolated by-elections, they spanned the country and came about six months before a general election must be called.

With the media coverage and energies spent by all political parties the spate of by-elections took on all the characteristics of a mini-election.

The ultimate Conservative strategy, remains "Keep Joe Clark breathing and we'll form the next government." But what will be the Liberal strategy? The only hope for the Liberals is to dump Pierre. This is not an alarmist cry. Unemployment, inflation, a weak Canadian dollar and an atmosphere of combative federalism have been endemic to the Trudeau regime and are not going to be forgotten in spite of a slick election campaign.

Had Trudeau gone into seclusion after the elections and pronounced "The Universe is unfolding..." and resigned, then perhaps the anti-Liberal sentiment could have been reversed before the big one. However, Trudeau is not a forgiving man and is not about to give way to a quick leadership convention to present the sceptre to John Turner on a silver platter. The Liberal Cabinet is not tough enough to push Trudeau into a leadership convention, to split whatever remains of the party.

No, Pierre, will remain and be slaughtered in the spring general election (proclamation of the War Measures Act notwithstanding). Joe Clark will sweep to power as did another Prairie populist some 20 years ago. Unfortunately for Clark his Cabinet will be filled with some very ambitious people. His last words may well be, "Et tu Tiny Perfect?"

Plea to Pierre: 'just be yourself'

Dear Pierre:

That learned political wit, Mr. Geoffrey Stevens - you know, the one who writes in the Globe & Mail... You don't know him? Oh, I see; you don't read the Globe. Pity! Anyway, this Mr. Stevens has taken it upon himself to send you various epistles telling you what you ought to do, especially given the grave issues that are now confronting this nation. We in the academic cloister are concerned that you may be receiving the wrong impression from Mr. Stevens' fatherly counsels. After all, his views are terribly one-sided. (And we all know how Liberal the Globe & Mail really is!) Therefore, in the interests of that thoroughly English phenomenon defined as 'fair play', we send you our own brand of advice.

What are your feelings today, Pierre, as you survey the wreckage of yesterday's electoral debacle? Are you angry? Dismayed? Dismayed? In agony? But of course, being the cold, rational intellectual that you are, you have no feelings. You only examine what has happened with a critical eye. And what has happened? You have lost several seats, too many seats in fact, and most of these have become Conservative holdings. - the Conservatives, Pierre; you must know them, that pack of jackals sitting opposite you in the House, heckling you every time you do something.

Now, people are already saying that it is your fault that you lost those seats. But we know better. It can't be your fault since you were not even running. It must have been those candidates that you fielded. What you needed is candidates of quality, people like Donald MacDonald, Mitchell Sharpe, Bud Drury, and Judy Lamarsh. Come to think of it, you had all of these people in your Cabinet once upon a time. What did you do with them?

I suppose that Keith Davey has been in to see you already? He wants you to resign? The gall of the man! Who would replace you? There are, to be sure, a few prime contenders. For instance, there is one John Napier Turner. - What's that? You need water? And smelling salts? Jean Chretien? Too provincial! Don Jamieson? He's from Newfoundland. Marc Lalonde? Too arrogant! Allan MacEachern? Perhaps, but party tradition is against him. Iona Campagnolla? A very competent Cabinet performer who has really whipped this country into shape, but she's a woman! Who else? Keith Davey himself? The Kingmaker wants to become King! Even you, Pierre, must see the irrationality of such a

Mammary Prostitution

Women - only an Income Tax Form could be more confusing.

This is the era of the raised consciousness. Male-female roles and stereotypes have undergone drastic alteration. The male of the species has been ordered to hide any vestige of overt masculinity in some vacant mental closet.

We were told that some new words had entered the language and that others were banished. Hello 'chairperson'. Goodbye 'girl'.

Most importantly, male persons were informed that female persons were no longer to be treated as people, as equals. It was a fair request and many men complied. We tried our damndest to free our piggy minds of hideous 'sex' stereotyping. We threw away our Playboys.

But then some women suddenly decided to exercise an ancient feminine prerogative. They changed their minds. "We want to be ladies once again," they cried. "We liked being objects after all."

And they began entering Wet T-Shirt contests in drooping droves.

Most unliberated. Most confusing. Of course, it could be economic necessity which is driving the poor souls to it. These are, after all, hard times. This is, The Land of the sinking dollar. It's hard for a girl nowadays to make an honest buck. So I suppose it's really no wonder that we find college co-eds hosing down their fronts and straining mastoid muscles, trying to win that big first prize of cold, hard cash.

The prizes are as ample as the proffered cleavage; often as high as $100 per matching set. Money like that would make even the healthiest Yonge Street hooker green with envy.

Mammary Prostitution. Whatever happened to self-esteem? Could it be said that those girls risking pneumonia up there on the stage have any sense of self-worth?

If they have their way, they soon will. The Old Sexist Standards will return - marching proudly through the barroom door. Big Boobs are back! Big Boobs bring a sense of self-worth! Especially when accompanied by applause from a slaving audience of snivel-nosed snipes. And a first prize of $100. Silicone saves!

It's a confusing world. Five years ago I would have cheered the sight of a bevy of buxom beauties baring bobbing breasts, smiling bravely, one eye on the applause meter.

But I'd come to understand that times had changed and that, difficult though it may be for most of us males, we were to view women as fellow human beings and not as objects. A lot of us had come to believe that a set of mammoth mammaries really wasn't a girl's most important attribute after all.

As I say, I'm a little confused. Or are the confused ones up there on stage?

You've come a long way, female person. Some of you have a long way to go.

Fan rowdiness out of control

The Editor

Last Saturday October 14 during the football game my sister was injured by the actions of some drunken students in the stands. A drunk engineer was pushed from a higher level of the stands and landed with considerable force on my sister's neck. Luckily some of the force was absorbed by a friend otherwise the injury could have been serious. She has spent the week in a neck brace because of the severe pain which caused her to collapse in class on Monday. I will not name the engineer responsible as he probably doesn't remember being at the game and because the crowd of students he was with are also partly responsible.

During this rowdiness the AMS were ineffective in maintaining control of the stands. Individual constables did their best but there was never enough of them

There are a few solutions to this problem: increase the number of constables at the games; give them more power to effectively control problem students; bring in outside security; abolish alcoholic beverages at the stands.

I haven't written this letter to criticize individual constables of the AMS but to make it clear by events at last Saturday's game that someone is going to be more seriously injured unless the crowd is more effectively controlled.

Hopefully some measures are being undertaken to curb the few immature students who often ruin things for the rest of us.

Needless to say my sister will have a few fond memories of her first homecoming game.

In defence of women

The Editor:

I am in a state of bewilderment regarding the Women's Self Defence Course (WENDO), which was ostensibly to be held this weekend, (Oct. 21 and 22). This course seemed the answer to a pressing need - the need for women to be able to walk in the streets - alone - confidently, anytime. It was with much eagerness that I awaited the announcement of dates, times, places etc.

Imagine my dismay when two weeks, three, four, went by without any sort of advertisements about this course. I had almost decided that it was a figment of my imagination, until I contacted the Queen's Women's Centre and was assured that, yes this course existed, and the registration date was to be the Friday before Thanksgiving weekend. I am puzzled by the fact that it was not until that Friday morning that any announcement was made of this course in the Journal. Furthermore, this announcement was so inconspicuous as to be almost invisible; in fact I searched twice through the issue before I spotted it. How did the Phys Ed. centre expect to get any registration for an unadvertised course? I am told that there were flyers posted regarding the WENDO course - I am an ardent bulletin board watcher and I saw none!

The point I am making is this: the course has been cancelled, due to supposed lack of interest. It seems ludicrous to me that on a campus of 5000 women, there weren't 20 interested enough to fill the course - in fact, it is ludicrous - there were more than 20 interested, more than 50, more possibly, than 75. I am extremely disappointed that because of the ineptitude of the Phys. Ed. centre in their organization of this event, it had to be cancelled, thus leaving Queen's women to tread the streets in fear.

move. No, Pierre, all the evidence points to the fact that you, and only you, are qualified to guide the Liberal Party through its destiny, which is to govern Canada.

But something has to be done about your present situation. Rightly or wrongly, the majority of the people in Canada hate you. Yes, Pierre, I know they love you in Mont Royal, but there is more to Canada than Quebec. What you have to do, Pierre, is to get out there and fight. No more of the philosophizing for which you have become infamous. It is excellent on the international stage, but Jimmy, Helmut, Valerie, and Jimmy are not permitted to vote for you. It is the people in Ontario, in the Prairies and in the Maritimes whom you have to consider. You know where all these places are, don't you, Pierre? . . . Good. What a relief!

You have to convince these people that you can manage the economy. You have to convince them that your dream of Canada is the right one. You have to convince them that you are the leader of a vigorous, refreshingly innovative Liberal Government. Does that sound like a tall order? It is, but we both know that you can do it. You did it in '68. You did it in '74. You can wow the people one more time, Pierre, if you give it all you've got.

So, lock Keith Davey in a room filled with computers spouting Gallop Poll results, a fitting fate for the man who would not let you call an election in April, and send your publicity agents as far away as possible. Be yourself, Pierre. That way, you can't possibly lose . . . or can you?

Respectfully and Concernedly yours,

Western Innocence?

The Editor:

Your recent feature on volunteers abroad was interesting and worthwhile. Yet some of the anti-Western bias evident in Mr. Van Dusen's article seemed naive. Western nations are far from ideal internally and are undoubtedly guilty of unfair dealings with less fortunate countries, but it is foolhardy to blame them for all the world's ills.

"Depressions, energy shortages, wars" and other injustices are not the sole responsibility of the so-called "white rulers" of the world. Reverse the present status of countries, and the "friendly and fascinating" people of the Third world would be guilty of the same faults. Skin color - whether black, white, or yellow, is irrelevant to a consideration of the stupidity, selfishness, and arrogance which are the common blessings of all humans. At any rate, one might keep in mind the failure of nearly all Third World countries to obtain anything like democratic government, and the resulting absence of freedom and rights among their citizens, when enunciating a moral preference for such nations.

This observation does not, of course, obviate the necessity for our own self-reform, and for sincere and concrete assistance to other countries, even when such assistance requires generous self-sacrifice.

Growth - the delusion of our times?

By Ian Robinson

We hear it every day: Canada's economy isn't growing rapidly enough; nuclear energy production has to grow to meet Canada's projected growth in energy consumption; etc.

"Growth" has become a value-loaded term when applied to talk of the economy. Stripped of the connotations, what does it mean, if not ever increasing rates of consumption met by corresponding increases in production?

The problems implicit in this idea were explored, ad nauseum, in such resources. If current rates of consumption continue we will face a crisis, probably by the turn of the century, which we cannot really visualize.

Economic growth continues to be extolled as the political and social panacea for our present ills, unemployment in particular.

Gloom and doom? So what's new? Nothing - and that is just the point. Economic growth continues to be extolled as the political and social panacea for our present ills, unemployment in particular. Why? Schumacher (in Small's Beautiful, 1973) argues that the answer lies in the realm of ideas.

First that the 19th Century thought to which our own is beholden has locked us into a "functional" mode of thought which concerns itself with means for maximizing efficiency

Economists have notably sacrificed that which they value highly - truth - in order to reduce unemployment - their own.

books as Limits to Growth (1972). Increased production ultimately rests on the increased exploitation and exhaustion of finite natural Towards what ultimate point is society tending by its industrial progress? When the progress ceases in what condition are we to expect that it will leave mankind?

- John Stuart Mill 1857

within the existing economic and technological setup.

The questions of whether the setup is itself desirable, and whether it is leading have been labelled "value judgement" and conveniently excluded from all "rational calculations". This is a theme which echoes through critical social thought from Weber and Marcuse.

In addition to the "philosophical" problem, Schumacher argues that within economic thought there is a serious methodological problem i.e. economists have not distinguished between renewable (or man-made) capital and non-renewable capital, because the criterion of comparison was not the absolute standard of costs.

Obviously the absolute cost of exhausting our oil is incalculable, and hence irrelevant to the traditional economist. What is important in a market economy is profits, and all that is necessary for their rational calculation is the relative value of a pound of wheat vis-a-vis a pound of oil, in money terms. Hence all differentiation and consideration of the different sorts of costs involved with different types of goods is short-circuited.

An example of this is electrical energy consumption growth in the United States. Between 1940 and 1970, the price of residential and industrial energy decreased at an average rate of 5.5 and 3.5 percent per year respectively, for a variety of reasons. Consequently, energy consumption grew at an even higher rate - average 7 percent - in this period, but the share of the GNP spent on the purchase of electricity remained almost constant.

A confusion seems to lie in the association of a high energy consumption with a high standard of living, because according to an American economist the U.S. ranks first in both.

There are two important points here.

1. The cost in terms of pollution and in terms of the exhaustion of finite supplies of oil does not enter into the above calculations, yet remains an important constant despite the falling price of electricity and the falling oil and coal prices which produced it.

2. The price of oil increased 5 times between 1973 and 1976, completely reversing the logic of even the limited kind of economics criticized above. Yet predictions of energy growth and hence, the need for rapid nuclear power development are predicated on the continuation of a growth trend which resulted from a fall in electricity prices, not an increase.

Schumacher's points are valid as far as they go. But they still beg the question of why Schumacher is discussed in a Religion course, while the people who plan U.S. or Canadian energy policies, not to mention cut-backs in social services have degrees from departments purporting to have something to do with "economics" and the real world.

One might attempt to explain this strange situation from the point of view of the economist themselves i.e. self-interest - they have learned a trade in high demand, so why question it, or 2. self-sacrifice - they have notably sacrificed that which they value highly - truth-in-order to reduce unemployment - their own.

Admittedly these analyses have a certain appeal, quite apart from the issue of their accuracy, yet they too are inadequate. Why should anyone else believe economists - simply deference to authority? But authorities, so called, have come and gone through the ages - surely none of us are so blind to the lessons of history as to suppose that our present economic authorities are any less fallible - which is to say, human - than their once illustrious predecessors? These explanations simply won't do.

Perhaps if we analyze the concrete situation to which we have already alluded, we can better understand what underlies the continued predilection toward a positive value of growth.

Energy Growth and Nuclear Power

The calculations of rapidly diminishing oil reserves by the various oil multinationals together with questionable assumptions regarding the continued demand for growing energy consumption, led governments and economists to see a gap defined as the distance between the growing and demand curve and diminishing supply curve (for traditional power sources). The problems with this "gap" are several:

Supply
Our only detailed sources of information on oil reserves are multinational corporations, and as these have an interest in under-reporting their reserves (remember the oil "shortage") in order to get tax concessions for further explanation, they are hardly the most reliable.

Economists have not distinguished between renewable (or man-made) capital and non-renewable capital.

Further, how do we calculate our present surpluses of hydro-electric power and natural gas into the equation - do we continue to sell it to the United States at current prices, or do we gradually phase out sales as Canadian demand increases?

Mostly, how do we calculate what levels of power non-nuclear alternatives to oil and coal i.e. methanol from wood by-products or solar power) can produce? To date no one, private or government, has spent enough research and development money to know what non-nuclear energy sources can contribute to total energy production, let alone institute a policy to maximize those sources.

For example, between 1958 and 1977 in Canada, $1,183 million Federal research dollars have been spent on nuclear energy, while renewable energy source funding did not even begin until 1974, and totalled only $14.2 million by 1977. That supply curve begins to look very sketchy indeed.

Demand
Consumption of energy in the U.S. and by extension Canada is based on a situation which no longer applies (falling energy costs). We can no longer expect future consumption trends to resemble those of the past.

Surely none of us are so blind to the lessons of history as to suppose that our present economic authorities are any less infallible than their once illustrious predecessors.

But how do we calculate the new trends? This would entail the examinations of the levels of current conception, in both the consumer and industrial sectors, and a determination of how much this can be reduced by new techniques or simply increasing efficiency. To save a kilowatt is now cheaper than to produce one.

It would also require some projection of both population and industrial growth. The former appears to be declining toward zero, but the latter will depend as much on the world economic situation as on purely internal factors. Hence it is exceedingly difficult to predict as well.

None of this work appears to have even been attempted, let alone integrated into a comprehensive energy policy. Instead, governments have simply answered a rate of growth (based on past rates) for lack of a better solution.

Based on this type of demand curve, Ontario Hydro has planned 33 nuclear reactors in this province by 1995. The demand curve looks as sketchily as the supply curve.

Result
Consequently, the "gap" is itself problematic, let alone its size. According to Dean Uffron, former Vice-Chairman of the Ontario Hydro Board of Directors, projections for 1985 world demand for the nuclear energy that was to fill the "gap" have had to be revised downward each year.

I suspect that if we analyzed each sector in the same way we would find the same types of assumptions, erroneous calculations, or just plain inability to predict the future on any other basis than the invalidated past.

1970 - 610 gigawatts (1 gigawatt - 10-9 watts)
1973 - 573 gigawatts
1975 - 475 gigawatts
1977 - 350 gigawatts

There are no figures yet for 1978, but the trend is clear. Will it go to zero? No one seems capable, let alone engaged in finding out.

A further confusion seems to lie in the association of a high energy consumption with a high standard of living, because according to calculations of an American economist, the U.S. ranks first in both. The fact that Sweden has a per capita energy consumption of about half that in the U.S. together with a far more extensive system of social services (i.e. free post-secondary education, comprehensive health care and unemployment insurance), must cause some doubt as to exactly what is meant by "standard of living", or perhaps, whose standards.

Thus, energy growth is deemed necessary and beneficial on the basis of the false imputation of a causal connection between energy consumption growth and prosperity, and on the grounds that the energy future must resemble the past.

This is not to suggest that a certain level of energy production is not necessary to the well-being of all our citizens, but only that the level need not constantly be rising, and that in our case, we may well have passed that level already.

The final factor pushing us toward energy growth and nuclear construction in particular is the inertia of vested interest. Governments and corporations have already committed hundreds of millions to nuclear planning and construction on the basis of the kind of simplistic projections of future supply and demand analyzed above.

The corporations, in particular, are not about to see their investment lost without a struggle - we are talking about the bankruptcy of immense power corporations such as Consolidated Edison in the U.S. Government, which as we all know, are loath to admit mistakes, particularly of the magnitude of this one.

This does not answer the question of why growth is so pervasive a notion in all spheres of the economy. I suspect that if we analyzed each sector in the same way as that of nuclear power energy consumption growth we would find the same types of assumptions, erroneous calculations, or just plain inability to predict the future on any other basis than on invalidated past.

At the most general level, I suspect that growth is posed as the solution to unemployment. After all, we need more jobs, don't we?

This begs the question of why we have too few jobs now. In the past 200 years, the European population rose from 120 million to 393 million. That certainly meant the necessity for the growth of production both to sustain this unprecedented population with goods, and to provide them with the jobs, and wages, to buy those goods.

This kind of phenomenal population growth is still occurring in the so-called Third World, but no longer in the west. The problem of unemployment seems to lie elsewhere this time, and I suspect that the solution must, in turn, be different from the growth response that has worked with more or less success for the last 200 years.

National Ballet: just 'Tu-tu' much

With the show having sold out weeks ago, Kingston was blessed Wednesday night with the National Ballet of Canada in a one-night performance - part of their long "enchantment" across Canada.

Quite clearly, the National Ballet is one of the best and most well-trained classical companies on the continent. With a style and technique borrowed from Britain's Royal Ballet they represent Royal austerity in a continent exploding with new dance companies, and new dance forms.

Despite the myriad of new companies and the public's increasingly divergent dance palates, the National knows what it wants, how to get it - and with Ottawa grants in the six figure bracket, they can afford it. Having dazzled New Yorkers on Broadway this summer with the traditional, but in their case, virtuosic Swan Lake, and of course Karen Kain, the National was ready Wednesday to entertain the off-Broadway patrons of Frontenac County. Dazzle, they did... but unfortunately, not with their Royal austerity and grace.

The opening number, entitled Bayaderka, should perhaps have been more aptly titled "Tu Tu Much", for it consisted of little more than a parade of twenty-four Ziegfeld-cloned ballerinas in identical Tu Tu's, repeating endless arabesques as each filed on stage. A quick glance at the programme assured this reviewer that Busby Berkely was not the choreographer, and that no, Esther Williams was not going to swan-dive into the whole thing.

Fortunately the number was saved, and I mean saved by a gratifying and long-awaited pas de deux with Karen Kain and Frank Augustyn. From his dramatic leaping entrance as Solor, a Valentino-like warrior, and throughout the entire dance, Augustyn displayed strength, precision and a boldness so often missing in contemporary male dancers. Karen Kain was equally (if not more) impressive, as she displayed her talents as a truly remarkable prima ballerina. Sharp and concise, there was nothing ambiguous about her dancing - the laws of gravity simply do not apply to her airy, delicate body.

A superb contrast to the classical nature of the first piece was offered by Monotones II, a work by Sir Frederick Ashton. Ingenious choreography, drawing heavily on asymmetry, marked this number as a "standout" for the evening. Linda Maybarduk, dancing with two no-less perfect male dancers, offered a beautiful, touching, and more importantly contemporary (a plus for the National) piece of ballet, dressed in arrestingly effective white body suits.

The highlight of the evening was the infamous ballet, The Rite of Spring, featuring Karen Tessmer and Frank Augustyn.

Introducing jazz dance and syncopated rhythms to their repertoire, this piece was a feast for the lower of symbolism, and interpretation. With fiery lighting, earthy, primal costumes and superb choreography, this number not only illustrated the sexually aggressive and primitive nature of man and woman - but the power of ballet as a visual as well as emotional means of theatrical expression.

No, this was not a "Busby Berkely" production...

"Wit" and the "Ghoul": a marriage of true minds

by Julian Cunningham

Two great men will arrive in Kingston today. Vincent Price is one of them. His alias-Oscar Wilde-is the other, as Price brings his one man class act, Divisions and Delights, to the Grand Theatre at 8.30pm.

Of course, everybody knows Mr. Price is great. Few people are aware of what constitutes his greatness.

The "suave villain", the diabolical spirit from the tormented pages of Edgar Allen Poe who has satiated horror-hungry eyes over one hundred times on film, is actually a man of the highest culture and refinement. His face and hands are first testimony to this, hands of compassion, and a face deeply lined with experience.

Mr. Price's original dream of becoming an artist never came true. Yet at age 67, he has already left behind him an artistic legacy. His "visual autobiography", I Like What I Know, depicts his life story from birth up until his late forties from an artistic viewpoint.

He has always found time to encourage young people in the arts. His innumerable lectures on university campuses has gained both the love and respect of students.

His second dream-acting-most certainly did come true. And tonight, the consummate actor's talents will fuse into the mind of Oscar Wilde, wit, playwright, "bavardeur extraordinaire", and indomitable spirit.

John Gay's Divisions and Delights, sets Wilde in an imaginary lecture in Paris one year before his death, in which he gives generously of his unparalleled witticisms. We will also see the tormented Wilde, the man who spent two years in prison under atrocious conditions, how he kept his sanity by writing faithfully on the one sheet provided him each day by the gaoler "The Ballad of Reading Gaol" was the result, a poem that tells of a spiritual victory over the object horrors of impending death.

Vincent Price, the ghoul-saint, will grace us not only with his presence but also with that of a kindred spirit another great man.

Two for the price of one
We should consider ourselves very lucky indeed

Vincent Price: more than a villain

Gabriel: bare talent exposed in Ottawa

by Frank Mulock

The story thus far. It's 1966 and 3 students at the Charterhouse school in England, Peter Gabriel, Michael Rutherford, and Tony Banks, have decided to form a group. The name — Genesis.

It's 1975 and Genesis is verging on mega-stardom, about to finally crack the U.S. market. Peter Gabriel, singer/frontman for the group, announces he is leaving.

It's last Saturday night at the Ottawa Civic Centre. The lights have dimmed and 6 beings in phosphorescent safety vests are pushing their way towards the stage flashing portable spotlights into the eyes of the 4,000 assembled. Suddenly the crowd clicks in as Peter Gabriel and company — an assortment of skinheads and freaks, ascend the stage and lurch into the opening bars of "On The Air".

What follows is an electrifying 90-minute performance, best I've seen in years. Gabriel is the complete entertainer — the performance a perfect mesh of music and theatrics.

The theatrics, however, never descend to the level of many of today's "musicians". There is none of the crotch-rock, machismo posing of people like Daltrey or Vanelli, none of the vomiting or self-laceration of the Pistols or Iggy Pop.

PG expresses himself via his music which he infuses with a little mime, a lot of energy. One moment during "Solsbury Hill" he is reminiscing over his reasons for leaving Genesis — "I was feeling part of the scenery, I walked right out of the machinery", the next he is up in the farthest reaches of the arena, being passed through the crowd, singing merrily along on his cordless microphone.

Peter Gabriel also sounds better on stage than on record. He rocks a lot harder in concert. His music is thick — a very prominent back-beat nails down a sound dense with synthesizers. All the material, save for a dazzling version of "The Lamb Lies Down on Broadway", is culled from his 2 post-Genesis solo releases, the most recent of which is one of the most impressive waxings to emerge this year. One final thought, for the last two years the punx have been laying into groups like Yes and Genesis, into people like Bowie and Gabriel, calling them "boring old farts" and monolithic, excessive, and expendable performers. On Saturday night while Gabriel was out on the tiles putting his band through the paces of a brilliant performance, Sid Vicious, bassist for the Sex Pistols, was languishing in jail, strung out on Methadone, charged in the stabbing death of his 20 year-old girlfriend. What more can I say?

Irish group covers spectrum

by Nick Gray

K.C.V.I. auditorium was filled to near capacity Wednesday night as the Comhaltas Concert gave a superb display of Irish traditional dancing, singing and music. The variation of styles and content ensured that no one was disappointed.

Top honours have to be given to the dancing quartet of Treasa Ni Cheannaigh, Donncha O Muineachain, Jackie Scanlan and Mairia Wogan. With absolute precision and an aura of gay abandon they performed a number of dances of such merit that it left no doubt in my mind that they were the most talented in the company. The audience response was similarly enthusiastic.

All the performers were good but a couple stand out in their excellence. Conall O Grada, though only 17 years old, performed wonders on the flute in a solo that is reminiscent of Mo Koffman. Breandan O Duill, the only professional member of the company displayed his many talents in both singing and developing immediate audience rapport. Finally, Paddy Fallon, the M.C. delighted his audience with wit and humour especially in reading: "A letter from mother."

It is unfortunate that the concert was marred by extremely bad lighting and the bored expressions of some of the performers

Applause! Applause!

by K. C. Finley

Queen's Musical Theatre is going to have a hit on their hands. The production that will open sometime in the beginning of February is Applause and, if the show's history tells no lies, Kingston's Grand Theatre will be housing another success.

Applause is a Betty Comden-Adolf Green collaboration, a shining child born of the pair's stellar talent and strong instinct for what makes a show worth raving about. Their current triumph, On The Twentieth Century has known little more than the strongest positive reaction though it isn't their only Tony winner. Applause itself won the three top honours that Antoinette Perry had to present in 1970, including best musical. This too is no surprise when one learns that the music is by Charles Strouse, the man who wrote the music for Bye-Bye Birdie, Annie, and A Broadway Musical, which will open later this year on Broadway.

The main strength of the scheduled production does lie in its book which puts a most interesting project before each player. This is perhaps why auditions for the show are slated to be held soon, before the month is out. Stressed by QMT president, Barb Granter, is the openness of these try-outs and the production staff's enthusiasm to see everybody even slightly keen to work on the show appear at the end of the month.

The show's director is Jill Hodgkinson and choreographing the many enticing dance sequences will be a bright star himself, Andrew Macbean. So, if the Queen's Musical Theatre can take all it has to work with this year and treat it with some professionalism, Applause should be the kind of musical that will make you want to stand up and cheer Wogan and Cheannaigh display their precision and grace movement.

Twin Sons of Different Mothers:
Dan Fogelberg & Tim Weisberg
reviewed by Sandy Graham

Dan Fogelberg and Tim Weisberg are two men who've laboured long and hard against current trends. Each has worked in such basics as form, statement, and melody with brilliant results. Fogelberg in his rustic netherlands of love and wonder, and Weisberg in the hectic, urban pace of his jazz-rock. Surprisingly, they work well together; their collaboration on the recently released album, "Twin Sons of Different Mothers," restores a good deal of my lost faith in popular music.

This is an unequal mix, wherein Weisberg does little more than play variations on a theme of pure Fogelberg. A more ambitious partnership might have had intriguing results; but then, can we honestly expect a fusion of what are essentially two fusion musics already? As it stands, the music these two produce, though it may lack a concise definition, is justified by its sheer beauty.

Weisberg's influence is most strongly felt in "Intimidation", a stylistic tribute from Fogelberg, and in a remake of the Hollies' "Tell Me To My Face". In each, we are treated to some fine and frantic trills and swoops, as Weisberg approaches the speed limit of his flute. Two and three octaves being played at once is a real thrill.

The last three cuts of side two could have easily been culled from any Fogelberg album. Paris Nocturne, an eloquent statement on piano, is garnished with flutes and oboes. The effect, though, is not cluttered as the arrangement strikes a good balance between richness and simplicity. Thus, we get a song that is so pretty it hurts. A sad and wistful climax is instantly followed by a beautifully orchestrated version of Judy Collins' "Since You've Asked". Those rugged, sunny days never felt so warm and comforting. A graceful pause before we lose ourselves forever on the "willow winding paths", and we are carried into the lure of "The Power of Gold". There is something surreal yet classic about this song as Fogelberg asks us to, "Balance the cost of the soul you've lost/With the dreams you lightly sold/Then tell me/That you're free/Of the power of gold".

There is not a lot of music on this album but it should keep me going until Andy Gibb starts raising dancin' fools of his own.

Further Adventures of:
Bruce Cockburn
reviewed by Bruce Stratton

Bruce Cockburn's latest album, "Further Adventures Of," is nothing short of superb. From beginning to end we are treated to the crafted work of a true artist. No longer is Cockburn Canada's premier "folkie", he is now Canada's premier musical artist as well.

Not surprisingly, "Further Adventures Of" follows the trend of its predecessors. The production succeeds brilliantly in obtaining a full, deep texture while staying clear of the "wall of sound" effect. Cockburn is making increased use of electric guitars, drums, and the bass guitar. The electric guitar is used to underpin rather than to dominate. The drums add focus, emphasis, and urgency to the songs which they are employed on. The most notable of these is "Feast of Fools", also one of the album's standouts.

Despite moving towards a more "rock" feel, however, Cockburn has not ignored his folk roots. The overall tone of the album is still quite folkie. Cockburn has been able to improve his music without making drastic alterations.

The playing on the album is excellent. Cockburn on guitar is as technically proficient and as innovative as ever. Eugene Martynec, Cockburn's producer, also makes an appearance on the album on electric guitar. Robert Boucher on bass and Bob DiSalle on drums mesh perfectly with the guitarists while Kathryn Moses provides a light touch on the flute.

The effect of this album is that of stepping out into a crisp autumn day and taking a deep breath of air.

Battered Wives:
reviewed by Brent Laviolette

I'm a relative newcomer to punk rock and many of my pre-conversion attitudes still hold. Plastic is too valuable a commodity to be wasted on no-talent groups, no matter what their social comment may be. Punkers have traditionally cast off any claim to musical proficiency and stressed "adolescent angst" as the most important aspect of their music.

Battered Wives, though they stick to the loud, bare, and clumsy format of punk rock music, display moments of musical excellence on their premier album. Specifically, the machine-gun guitar playing of Toby Swan and John Gibb raise this group above the clamour of other punk bands and made for a refreshing change in a world of dull axes.

Engineer Mick Walsh and producer Phil Lubman have created a masterpiece in the annals of punk history. The album boasts concise bare-boned reproduction on a see-through vinyl surface but not without some electronic sophistication. Drummer Cleave, an person and bassist Jasper remain, appropriately, in the background while all four band members contribute to the lyrics. And what lyrics! "Over's Balls" is hilarious and unprintable, "Uganda, Stomp" hails King Kili, "Angry Young Man" demands misinterpretation and Everybody Loves a Lover" immortalizes the already immortal Hitler, Chaplin, O-wald, and W. Fields.

Battered Wives, it should be noted, is a Canadian production through and through — with scene heavy helping hands from Toronto radio station, Q-EM. It's punk rock at its finest, without any serious message and lots of fun. Pick it up, you can always use the attractive red disc as a pizza platter.

The current Elvis Costello Battered Wives tour has prompted the National Union of Students (NUS) to ask universities not to book the Wives act because of alleged violence toward women attitude displayed by the group. Apart from the unusual logo on their album cover, the group shows no such attitude lyrically or theatrically.

Golden Flippers strong second

by Marty and John

Captain Mitch Dent led the Queen's Waterpolo Gaels to a solid second place standing in the OUAA eastern division Saturday afternoon. Behind Dent's 7 goals, the team showed easy superiority over RMC and York University, winning 13-7 and 8-5 respectively, then lost a heartbreaker to Carleton 7-5.

The Gaels had a shaky start with RMC, and found the game tied at the half. Rookie Igor Glew and veteran Graeme Black sparked the offense with a hat-trick each and Queen's coasted to its first win. "The team had to get this game out of its system," said Dent. "The first game of the season is always tense."

Against York, Queen's started impressively building a 4-1 lead at the end of the first quarter. The key play of the game happened late in the second quarter, when Dave (Weasek) Ardell succeeded in getting a York player kicked out of the game. Chuck Leighton put the game out of reach with 2 goals in the final quarter, as Queen's rested most of its starters for the Carleton game.

Fans were treated to some spectacular waterpolo in the Queen's-Carleton match. Carleton's squad, boosted by the presence of two national team members never allowed to control the game. The score was tied 4-4 at the half. Excellent goaltending by Richard Glew (who at one point stopped a penalty shot by national star Pat Simmons) kept Queen's in the thick of it. Bad breaks and foul problems allowed Carleton to move ahead in the last quarter. "This team can do it," said coach Simon Beutler. "The shooting was off but they stayed with Carleton the whole time. Simmons only got two goals; national team member Geoff Brown got none. It will be a good race. Queen's moves to Carleton next weekend and will be at home again Nov. 18.

Rowing is growing for women

by Diana Coulter

Interest and participation in women's rowing at Queen's is growing as the Queen's Rowing Club pulls well into its second season. Try-outs were held after frosh week and produced over one hundred girls competing for 29 spots on the three women's crews. Since then the Varsity and Junior Varsity women's crews have been practicing, weather seldom causing a halt in their routine, at 6 a.m. every morning. Novice women spend the sunset hours between 5:30 and 8:00 on their daily work-out in the Bay

near RMC

At present, the crews have participated in two regattas these being the "Head of the Rideau" and the "Head of the Trent", which have ended with promising results, and good spirits. On Homecoming weekend, Queen's hosted Carleton and Trent in a regatta. Strong winds prevented the races but entertainment for the disappointed crews was provided in the true Queen's fashion. This weekend the Varsity Women's team will be rowing in Boston at the "Head of the Charles" against crews from Harvard and Yale. The crucial races yet to come are the Brock Invitational and the OWIAA finals both being held in St. Catharines. Last year the Novice Women's crew came first in both the Novice and Junior Varsity divisions of the Brock Invitational, Varsity placing high as well. This race will again be the Novice and Junior Varsity's final race as they are club crews and competition in the OWIAA championships is, therefore, not possible. The Varsity women's crew will be there to carry Queen's colours and hope to improve on last year's third place finish.

The women's Junior Varsity Rowing Crew practices in the early morning, working towards the Brock Invitational.

Finals await runners at Brock

by Jeff Bellinger

Adam Shoemaker and Rob Livingston, the top runners on the Queen's cross country team, have been named to the Ontario team which will represent the province at the National Cross Country Championships in Vancouver on the eleventh of November. Both were named to the team after their excellent performances at the Ontario Cross Country Championships held last weekend at Toronto's Boyd Conservation Area. Adam was named to the senior squad, while nineteen year old Rob will run in the junior category.

Shoemaker, Livingston to the nationals in Vancouver

Rob is from Ottawa and is a second year student in the Commerce Department. Due to injuries, he was unable to compete for Queen's last year, but his year of absence from the racing scene isn't bothering him in the least this year. Rob placed second this weekend in a tough race over a hilly 8000 meter course. He felt that a slight tactical error cost him the race. For Rob, the Nationals will give him the chance to show everyone on the Canadian cross country scene that he is back in top form.

Adam is a fourth year history major from Ottawa and top level competition is nothing new to him. He won a bronze medal in the junior category of the Nationals last year in Hull, Quebec. During the summer, he ran in both the Canadian track Championships and the Commonwealth Games Trials. His third place performance of this weekend Senior Championships looks even better when one recognizes the fact that he is only in his first year of senior. Looking ahead, Adam will be kept very busy. He will represent Queen's in both the Track and Cross Country OUAA Finals. Then he is off to the Nationals in Vancouver where he has a good chance of making the Canadian team slated to compete at the World Championships in Ireland in March. By virtue of his third place finish, Adam was also selected to race in the USA AAU Championships which are being held in Seattle, Washington.

The rest of the men's cross country team all put in fine performances at this weekend's meet. Along with Livingston, Jeff Bellinger (13th), Bob Graham (15th) and Hugh Tafel (38th) placed second in the Junior team standings. Both Bellinger and Graham narrowly missing spots on the Ontario team.

In the Senior race, the competition was the best witnessed at an Ontario championship, Mike DeGuda who placed twenty-fifth last year moved up to 18th spot. Ian Gale (31st), Claus Rinne (33rd) and Dale Frieson (48th) rounded out the scoring for Queen's over the extremely tough 12,000 meter course.

Coach Dave Grant had a harder time of it as he is still suffering from the flu that the majority of Kingston residents have had this fall. He had an even tougher job after the meet though: to pick the six runners who will represent Queen's at the OUAA Finals at Brock University.

Named to the team are: Adam Shoemaker, Rob Livingston, Claus Rinne, Mike DeGuda, Ian Gale and Jeff Bellinger. Alternates will be Bob Graham, Sandy MacAuley and Dale Frieson. Grant feels the team is stronger than last year's team as four of the members of last year's second place team are back this year. All the pain, training, hours of travel, miles and more miles come down to one thing - 12,000 more meters, hopefully the best that any of these guys will ever run.

42-0, 40-0 redeem spirits

Gaels burn Badgers

by Don Cameron

Last weekend the Rugby Gaels returned from St. Catharines with their fourth victory of the season, after walloping the Brock Badgers 42-0.

The wet and slippery field conditions certainly affected Brock's game, as their backs' ball handling was poor and their forwards' mobility and loose play weak. The Gaels, learning a lesson after their loss to Western, played a solid all-out game. The Queen's forwards dominated virtually every set and loose play of the day, giving scrum half, Larry Cook, opportunity to give the backs "good ball". Del Delmonte, Pete Bloemen, Dave Loucks, Gord Nixon and Rob Bruce were particularly effective in the rucks and mauls, most of which were won through their efforts.

The first scoring play of the game was made by Del Delmonte, who illustrated the second phase nature of rugby by stripping the ball from Stone seconds before he was tackled. Del played a fine game as prop forward showing that, vegetarian or not, he was a man to be feared.

Dan MacIntosh, playing his first game as fly half, caught and fed the ball well to Queen's backs: Slattery, Wilson, Cottingham and Reid. The backs definitely outplayed their counterparts on the Brock team with scores by MacIntosh (2), winger Dave Cottingham and "Zulu" Wilson. Coach Reid noted that the backs illustrated their skill by successfully running many advanced move plays. Denis Boright played a very respectable game as fullback, covering well and kicking three out of four converts. Nixon was good on one convert.

The Gaels' back row led by Captain Bill Payne, terrorized Brock's backs with hard tackling and powerful running. Bill Payne, with his running from set scrums, showed that he was a capable offensive as well as defensive player. Stoner combined rugby and aquatic skills by diving through the air for the five yards after a long run to score a try. (It was common knowledge that wet weather sometimes confuses Stoners' motor control centre making it difficult for him to decide whether he is diving or playing rugby.) Wing forward Tim Hyde scored on a kick he blocked in Brock's end zone.

The Gaels played a unified, smart game of rugby showing their form as a top level team. The 42-0 victory over Brock, was well deserved.

Sunday the XV Rugby Gaels hosted Trent University. The Gaels outclassed the Trent firsts in every aspect of the game, the score of which was 40-0. Hooker John Strudwick realized his lifelong ambition by scoring a try. Tim Price, Andy Boright and Kevin Wilson all played strong games for the Gaels. This weekend the teams play York University at 12pm and 2pm here at West Campus.

Season opens for V-ball men

by Dave Tod

The Queen's Men's Intercollegiate Volleyball team travelled to Toronto last Sunday for the Ontario AA qualifying tournament to see their first action of this season. By winning 8 of 15 games the Gaels are now eligible to compete in the AA League with the top club and university teams in the province.

The team played well against stiff competition, with strong performances from Bruce Rodin and Dave Morton. After losing some very close matches, the Gaels redeemed themselves by soundly defeating Laurentian University, then Kaley at the end of the day.

With three players: Bruce Rodin, Biraj Bora and Dave MacDonell, and the coach Vaclav Smola, selected to the OUAA all-star team for last season's work, the Volleyball Gaels are looking forward to another successful season.

The team, accompanied by our women's Intercollegiate team, travels to St. Catharines today for the Brock Invitational Tournament on Saturday.

Middle linebacker-defensive key

by Donald MacKinnon

Tomorrow afternoon in Lennoxville Quebec, the Queen's Golden Gaels will put their unbeaten record on the line, in a battle for first place with Bishop's University Gaitors. Bishop's can grab first place with a victory. The Gaels, who also want home field advantage in the playoffs, are trying to emulate Don Gilbert's 1975 edition of the Ottawa U Gee Gecs, the last team to go undefeated in regular season play.

Much has been written and said about the Gaels' awesome offense, but as the season drags on and playing conditions deteriorate, the defensive team traditionally assumes a more crucial role in a team's hopes for prolonged post season play.

The Gaels' defense, in terms of points it has allowed, is the second best in the country. They've given up the niggardly total of 43 points, while scoring 18 themselves. Anchoring that defense, in a position that most football pundits argue is the key spot, is middle linebacker Ed Andrew.

A bearded face tops a bull neck and a barrel chest, yet his 200 pound six foot frame is relatively small for the position he plays. Andrew, however, epitomizes the old football cliché, "it's not what you got, but how you use it that counts".

John Thompson, the Gaels' defensive coach, delighted in being able to say, "If he isn't the best middle linebacker in Canada, he should be" (a reference to the All Canadian team that will be announced next month).

Now in his third year with the Gaels, Ed came straight from Saint Andrews High in Aurora (where Ted Tycza also played high school ball) and made the team in his first year. He feels he owes a great deal of his success to the calibre of his coaches over the years. His High School coach had been a member of Leo Cahill's Argos staff, and when Leo was dropped by the Scullers, he went too. "My High School coach helped me a lot, and then when I came here, John Thompson was coaching the defense" (To a man, the defense is impressed with, and feel honoured to play for, Thompson).

The middle linebacker's primary responsibility is the run up the middle, followed by outside runs, and then the pass. Though it seems longer from in the stands, a trap or a dive play is often over in three or four seconds. The middle linebacker has less than a second to commit himself. If he does the wrong thing, he may not even get a hand on the ball carrier before he's by him. If he does the right thing, which usually involves shedding a 220 pound (or larger) lineman, the middle linebacker then must tackle a back, who in Andrew's case is often about his weight, who is running hard right at him. If a middle linebacker doesn't know what he's doing, his chance of survival is limited. So far, Ed and Paul Langevin (who occasionally joins him in the middle, depending on the defensive alignment) have survived.

With two years of play under his belt, and the added confidence that weight training has given him, Ed Andrew is playing with poise. Tomorrow he faces his toughest test of the season. In Ed's opinion, with the exception of the Gaels' Dave Marinucci, against whom he is thankful he doesn't have to play, Bishop's Bruce Wilkins is the finest fullback in the league. Ed knows that he has playing in front of him a defensive line "that has made my job a lot easier", and which will be just as keen to limit Wilkins' yardage tomorrow.

While not appearing sanguine about tomorrow's game, what everyone on the team is guarding against, Andrew feels that "if we play the way we're capable of playing, we shouldn't lose". Coming from a man who has had two perfect games, according to John Thompson, the Gaels' chances tomorrow of enjoying a happy bus ride home, appear good.

Athlete of the Week

Jim D'Andrea has earned the position of Athlete of the Week due to his outstanding defensive efforts in Saturday's football game. D'Andrea pulled in three interceptions to bolster Gaels' defensive secondary. His first interception put Queen's in good field position for a

by "The D.A."

On Friday Oct 18th the Queen's Field and Track teams travelled a long seven hours to Windsor. Saturday was cool though pleasant. The morning events started off well for the jumping team as veteran team captain Peter Beck placed second in the men's triple jump behind the men's Champion, with a respectable 13.83m. Perhaps the most surprising performance was recorded by rookie manager Greg Boyle, who, after an unsettling first few jumps, displaying rather strange form, placed third with a personal best (PB) of 13.25m. Graham McWilliam, a rookie, placed seventh to complete the field.

The men's high jump saw promising rookie Steve Waring jump 6'5" to place third. Two weeks ago, Steve jumped 6'6" to establish the season's first Queen's record. James Robertson, also a rookie, placed fifth with a jump of 5'10".

In the men's pole vault, John Tomovli placed first, clearing 4.2m. Rookie Ted Jackson jumped close to a PB at 3.81m—good enough for a second. Mark Judge, displaying his characteristic consistency, no-heighted, while Dave Kuhn, one of our more intelligent rookies, could not jump as he forgot his pole.

The men's long jump saw Queen's place second, third and fourth, with Graham Boyle, Graham McWilliam and Ed Kvast respectively jumping 6.20m, 6.01m, and 6.00m. Along with OUAA defending champion Peter Beck, and Tom O'Shaughnessy, this gives Queen's five jumpers who can jump over 6.00m; the depth in the jumping events is new to the Queen's field and track team. This possibly correlates with our new coach Sue Bolton.

Jim Morrison looked good in taking both hurdle events with times of 15.6 and 58.7 secs. The 15.6 was a PB. Jim looks strong to take both at this year's OU's. Paul Tinari placed third in 61.1 secs. Sandy MacAuley had a good day, recording two PBs, with a 15.23.4 sec. 5000m and a 4.10.3 1500m. Both efforts gave him second place. Sandy's running and musical abilities make him a strong team member. Dan Rocheleau also had 2 PBs, in the 200m and the 400m.

In the men's 100m, Duncan Card, defending OUAA champion placed first in a strong field with an excellent 10.4 secs clocking. Jeff Stonwick took fourth in a PB time of 10.55. In the 200m, Duncan, once again the defending champion, ran a coast inf 21.8 to record the fastest time of the day in his heats. Chris Reid, a promising rookie, placed fourth in the 200 with 23.0secs. Chris also is a proficient hurdler. Duncan and Jeff look like a possible 1-2 combination in the short sprints, and along with Chris Reid, the sprints look strong—a Queen's tradition. Vic Googing, now a coach, still holds both the 100m and 200m records. Vic tried his hand at the 800m on the weekend and ran a 2:03sec. race. Not bad for an old man, eh? Greg Watson, a rookie, in his second ever 800m, ran an excellent PB time of 2:00.01 min. to place fifth.

In the 3000m steeplechase Colin Funk placed a good second, coming off of a two year layoff in 9:53.4. Les MacGregor came in third at 10:06.2. Queen's relays were quite a motley affair—being comprised of high jumpers, long jumpers and javelin throwers in converse. We had three teams in the 4x100 placing 5th, 7th and 8th. In the 4x400m, the teams came third and fourth. Ed Kwastvan an excellent 400m split of 52.5secs—his first time ever running that distance.

Thus, the team had quite a successful weekend and is looking forward to defending their OUAA crown on Sat. Oct. 21st beginning at 10:30 am. here at the Richardson Stadium. The meet is of high calibre and will sure be enjoyable to watch.

Sailors national champs

by Clayton Jaeger

Thanksgiving weekend the Queen's Sailing Team once again established itself as the tops dinghy racing team in Canada. Saturday and Sunday RMC hosted the Canadian National Dinghy Championships, which we won by a margin of 46 points ahead of second place.

Attendance was strong with eleven teams participating. Universities as far away as UBC, Dalhousie and many inbetween showed up for a weekend of good, competitive sailing.

Among those Queen's sailors there were Terry McLaughlin, Sticky Glew, Jane Hickey, Ian Struthers, Sari Cross and Tony Snell.

Twenty-two races were held and Queen's placed first in fourteen of them, despite the presence of other stable sailors such as Glen Dexter (Sailing World Champ 77).

Last weekend, due to a last minute change of plans, RMC hosted the Canadian National Sloop Championships, which Queen's won also. Sailing in Viking 22's were Terry McLaughlin, Steve Fleckenstein and Tony Snell. Four races were held on Saturday and Queen's won 3 of them.

Soccer Gaels break five game streak

by Benny

The Golden Gaels travelled to London on Saturday and fell from the ranks of the undefeated. An indirect free kick in the penalty area found its way into the back of the net and that was the margin of victory for Western.

The match was considered pivotal with regard to play-off positions. Despite the blustery wind both teams produced good quick soccer in the first half on a well-kept pitch. Brian Sawyers was rudely welcomed back into the fray as he bumped with an opponent in the penalty area. The penalty shot was converted and for the first time this season the Gaels were behind. Andy Goodman reciprocated Sawyers' effort and Austin McGhie converted the penalty to pull Queen's back even.

The last 45 minutes of the game were exciting and newsworthy to watch. Both teams attacked and defended well but dangerous chances just weren't in the offing. Then the free kick that sent Western home as winners was awarded. Their first attempt which Saunders saved was nullified as the referee had detected some pushing in the wall. He even cautioned a Western player but then, to the Gael's amazement, indicated the kick was to be taken again. This time the shot whistled into the net. Sky Walker Goodman was unfortunate not to have his header find the back of the net as he bounced the shot off the crossbar and thus the game ended 2-1 in Western's favour.

The Gaels hope to have a squad free of nagging injuries for their match against Laurentian on Saturday. Mike Fonteyn won this week's award for sporting the season's best shin. The loss again emphasizes the unsettled nature of the leagues standings. Everyone has dropped at least three points and until the number of matches played has been equalized it's impossible to determine who has the inside track. If nothing else the Gaels have been shown they are not invincible. Perhaps now, given that their playoff chances rest solely in their own hands, they will demonstrate their true talents against Laurentian. Although considered a home game, the match will be played at RMC on Saturday, with the kickoff at 2pm.

Boneman's Byline

This weekend there is a sporting event on campus that seems to negate the theory that Queen's students are generally apathetic. The event is the Queen's United Way Touch Football Tournament which is being played this weekend at Tindall Field. This football tournament is just one example of student interest in charitable causes as shown by the fact that over 150 people are taking part. What has been lacking in the past, however, are innovative people who are willing to take the time to harness this spirit; hopefully this event will spawn a rash of similar activities.

This tournament combines the best attributes to athletic endeavour, a competitive atmosphere linked with the chance to enjoy the great outdoors. The friendly nature of this tournament is the atmosphere that Bews strives for, yet has not been able to maintain. This tournament has given a number of aspiring athletes the chance to show what they can do, but have never been given the chance to do in Bews. This tournament also allows friends from different faculties to compete together for one of the few times at Queen's, as evidenced by the entries of "Team Zingini" and "Team Hummer". Another unusual sport is that the tournament is meant to be co-ed, enabling girls to show their moves (on the gridiron).

Bews at midseason

by Mark Penland

Outdoor sports are approaching mid season and certain teams are establishing themselves as strong contenders for championship finishes. It may be safe at this time to make some predictions about the likely champs and the teams to watch in the playoffs.

First of all, a prediction may be necessary in the area of playing conditions. Prediction: The field conditions will not get much worse. Prediction: The Indian summer will arrive next week! Prediction: Snow will not fall during any play-off games!

Traditionally the graduating Law team has shown prowess on the rugby field. Prediction: Civil and PHE will battle for that title this year.

The Flag Football league will be tight this year, with most games being decided by only a touch-down. Prediction: Commerce 79 and MBA will be the teams to beat, with Commerce 79 the edge on defence.

My prediction last week of Mechanical and Chemical both dominating the Soccer league will stand. New Prediction: Pele will not play in the final game.

Moving to the indoor sports, the choice of contenders becomes more cut and dry. Prediction: Arts 80 and Commerce 80 are the teams to beat in this H2O sport. Commerce 80 will submerge all competition along the way to victory.

The two arena sports have just begun so "safe" predictions are not likely - however judging by last year's final standings, an attempt will be made. Predictions: Mining and Commerce 79 will meet in the final of Broomball with Mining retaining the championship. Prediction: Meds, Commerce 79 and Arts 80 will all contend for the Hockey title but Commerce 79 will emerge victorious.

The Queen's World Series will be played all day Saturday as the Interfaculty indoor softball tournament gets underway in the Bews Gym. Spectators are welcome.

Role to prepare

Much has been said this past year about the role of universities in what is typically described as an "age of constraint." Cutbacks in the social services, the prospect of an even further deterioration of the Canadian economy, and no foreseeable expansion of an already over crowded job market have led many to question the worth of a university education, particularly in the general arts and science disciplines.

It has been argued that students are increasingly looking at the university degree as a job ticket and less as a recognition of intellectual achievement. Consequently, this has led to increased enrollment in community colleges offering technical programs and in degree programs at universities such as commerce and engineering. These programs are seen to provide the desired result of attending university.

But should the role of university be measured in these terms? The problems facing Canadian society today are ones that require not only technical experts but people with liberal arts background that provides analytical tools to critically evaluate them.

Canada is currently embarking on a period when its capacity for research and development must be expanded to facilitate effective competition in an increasingly competitive international economy.

The role of the university is therefore to prepare people capable of dealing with the myriad of functions required to enable Canada to fully develop. Both technical and liberal arts degrees have their place in this process, and one should not be stressed at the expense of the others.

Our apology

In reference to a comment made by law student Tony Hine reported in last Tuesday's Journal in the front-page story "Student bootlegging fines", Mr. Hine wishes to clarify his position. The question asked of Mr. Hine, as he was leaving Provincial Court after the trial, was, "What do you think of what happened today?"

Mr. Hine's reply was, "I'm amazed. Obviously they decided to screw Queen's, and that's exactly what they did."

The interpretation put on this statement by the Queen's Journal was that Mr. Hine was referring to the Court. Mr. Hine has indicated that he was not referring to the Court in the statement.

The Queen's Journal apologizes to Mr. Hine for any inconvenience this may have caused, and notes that both Mr. Hine and the Queen's Legal Aid Society consistently attempt to observe the highest standards of legal ethics.

Tricolour: better late than never

Tricolour distribution since late September has been, to say the least, inefficient and a subject of grievance for many students.

Though an earlier distribution from Info-Bank went smoothly, those students who for some reason were unable to pick up the book, are now finding it almost impossible to obtain.

The Tricolour office, which distributes the book now, has no regular hours. The door is papered with notes from frustrated students begging that hours be posted or leaving phone numbers in hopes of information.

The yearbook's Business Manager Debbie Coughtrey said it was the student's fault if they had not obtained their books during the normal period, and that they would just have to keep coming back.

Editor Cindy Peterson added she was making an effort to contact the students, but they "will just have to keep trying to catch someone there for now."

Not good enough, the inadequacies of distribution demand correction.

Noranda keeps Trustees hopping

By Ian Anderson and Rob Southcott

At a closed meeting this past Friday and Saturday, the Queen's Board of Trustees adopted a report concerning the issue of social responsibilities in relation to Queen's financial investments.

The issue centers around Queen's ownership of $250,000 in shares of Noranda Mines, a company who has proposed a $350,000 investment in Chile. The principle objections to the proposed investment centre around the alleged political oppression in Chile since the September 1973 overthrow of Chile's democratic government by a military coup d'etat. The reports of repression have led the United Nations General Assembly to pass two resolutions condemning the junta of General Pinochet, and have prompted a coalition of groups, including The Christian Churches of Canada, to call for an economic boycott of Chile.

In April of 1977, Queen's Board of Trustees declined to join an effort organized by this coalition to have shareholders oppose Noranda's plans of expansion. The issue was raised at a meeting of the AMS Outer Council in November, 1977, at which time then AMS President Hugh Christie, Noranda condemning the investment proposal.

Not satisfied with this, a group of students and faculty organized themselves as the Committee of Concern for Chile (CCC), carrying the question of whether Queen's, as a shareholder of Noranda, should oppose the investment.

In a referendum on November 22-23 of last year, Queen's students, in the largest turnout in years, voted an overwhelming 72 per cent in favour of opposing such investment, and with that, the Board of Trustees decided to establish a committee to assess the University's social responsibilities.

Materially, the situation has changed very little over the course of the past six months, despite an April meeting between a delegation sent by the Board of Trustees and Alfred Powis, the President of Noranda. At this meeting, the delegation informed Mr. Powis about the referendum and the fact that the course of action taken by Queen's would be taken on the basis of the new committee's report, which was the one that was presented this past Friday and Saturday.

Though the report stated that the university would take actions concerning their investments against any company that "engages in activities which might directly affect

G.W. peeved over Urinal

by Eric Evans

Golden Words co-editors Graeme Bate and Rob Cockburn are involved in controversy this week with students from mining engineering over the printing of the "Urinal".

Traditionally, Golden Words has done a mildly humorous take-off on the Journal each fall. However, according to Bate, last year's edition created a number of problems for Golden Words staff when it was picked up by a number of alumni around campus. "They thought it was the Journal at first, and were appalled with it when they found out it wasn't. Some alumni even complained to the Alumni Office and to Dean Uffen of the Faculty of Applied Science, threatening to discontinue making contributions to the university." As a result, stated Bate, Golden Words decided not to run a "Urinal" edition this year.

However, late last week it was revealed that students from the Mining Engineering Department had gone ahead and done a "Urinal" on their own. Cockburn, furious, stated that the edition is poorly written and badly edited.

"We're really worried that everyone on campus will think that Golden Words has done the 'Urinal'." Even though several regular staff members helped put the paper out, it's really a waste of newsprint.

Despite Golden Words demands that Mining students not distribute the paper, it apparently will be found around campus tomorrow.

Mini-Folklore proved a great success as many people turned out to watch the events and view the exhibits.

Punk band sexist: NUS

by Liz McClung

"Battered Wives", the controversial "new wave" band, has been the subject of heated debate recently, following a National Union of Students (NUS) motion to deny them bookings on Canadian campuses.

After an extensive examination of the group's name, logo, and the social impact of their music, the NUS has sent a memo to all its members requesting them to refuse to hire the band.

The controversy has arisen as a result of the connotations of violence and sexism inherent in the name "Battered Wives", and the logo, which is a heart surrounding a clenched fist bearing a lipstick imprint. Along with NUS, women's groups, musicians' unions and university councils have protested the appearance of the band, on the grounds that it is sexist, and that it "capitalizes on violence against women."

The directive of the NUS advising against the band's appearance on campuses sparked a fiery debate at Carleton recently. The student council of Carleton (CUSA) had booked the band for Halloween weekend, but on Oct 10, in an emotionally charged meeting, representatives from the Women's Center, a home for battered wives, and the Quebec Union of Musicians made presentations to the council.

Ceremony is still a burning flame

Leslie Shannon

Eight hundred candles flickering in the darkness of Grant Hall last Wednesday night marked the 90th anniversary of the "Candlelighting" ceremony at Queen's.

It was in 1878 that women first came to Queen's, and ten years later that the Levana society established the tradition of lighting candles to mark a symbolic bond of friendship between the women of the incoming class. The traditional ceremony of welcoming was, as in years past, a very special and moving occasion for the class of '82. Yet the role of women on campus has changed greatly over the years, from participation mainly in bible studies to activity in the equal right movement. Noting this change, and the opportunities now open to women, was the speaker for this year's "Candlelighting", Patricia Merrin, an Arts 70 grad who is a special assistant to Marc Lalonde.

In a warm, entertaining address, Merrin noted how the "student spirit remains strong within me." Beginning on a strong note of encouragement, she remarked how "you all share the common denominators of being new, young, vigorous and bright; qualities that give people a head start in no matter what situation." Merrin advised her audience that Queen's has lots of room for individuals, and each of you brings your own individuality to campus life.

Merrin sees university as an environment "that is a proverbial fireworks display of sensory overload in terms of knowledge explosion and intense personal development." She believes that Queen's is a place to cultivate your personality, noting "there is something so solid about all this limestone that liberates you to delve into whatever you want to experiment or explore. You can look at the enlightenment of knowledge as a major cultivating force. The learning environment fosters creativity and advances growth."

Merrin advised her audience to be physically fit, actively involved in university life and politically motivated.

"Canada cannot afford to have you recline into passive despair over whether there is hope for the world. Given your gifts, it is your responsibility to contribute to society both for your own and the collective good," she said. She encouraged the women to consider that the possibility of living as a single person is important. "The more you know about yourself as an independent entity, the more you will bring to the relationships into which you may enter later."

In closing, Merrin conveyed the hope that "you will become learning women, believers, leaders, self-directed and tolerant."

With the final lighting of the candles, the symbolic flame of hope, friendship and the spirit of Queen's, was passed on once more.

advocating the cancellation of the band's engagement.

The motion was defeated, despite appeals to principles, and accusations that the band had "chosen to be coldly and brutally exploitative."

This decision was later reversed by the trustees of CUSA.

In response to their growing notoriety, the stage manager of "Battered Wives," Dave Hughes, stated that there is nothing in the band's act, or appearance (short hair and suits) that promotes violence. He went on to say that the name "Battered Wives" stems from the band's own feeling of being "battered"—finding acceptance from neither punk rockers nor mainstream rock artists.

According to the band, their music and lyrics are not those of true punk rock; they can only be described as "new wave".

the well-being of the University," concern over "matters of social responsibility related to the University investments" would only warrant conveying "concerns to the corporation". In addition to adopting this as policy, the Board of Trustees decided to maintain a standing committee to receive student concerns on matters of the University's social responsibilities.

AMS president Dave Brown, who was a delegate to the Board of Trustees, meetings, commented that he thought it was good there was going to be a "standing mechanism" to act on student concerns. He was unconvincing, though, that the existing committee would significantly affect the situation of investments in Noranda. Despite his feeling that "the Noranda things is widespread," Brown said that, "we'll have to go through the whole thing again" despite student opinion already having been tested. Brown urged students "to take the issue up again if they still feel strongly about this," for, in his opinion, "without further opinion expression from students, there's nothing more that's going to come of it."

Whether or not anything comes of the Noranda situation, such investment policies might bring other investment holdings of Queen's into question. These could include shares in the Royal Bank of Canada and the Toronto Dominion Bank, both part of an international consortium which advanced credit to Chile, and investments in International Nickel or Alcan, both of which have major holdings in South Africa.

Students flock to Centre for general fitness tests

Kim Fennell

Students were given the opportunity to find out what shape their bodies were in last Thursday, at a fitness workshop in the John Deutsch University Centre.

The Ontario Mobile Fitness Van conducted one-hour intensive fitness tests upstairs in the Central Meeting Area, while Exertek Consulting Firm of Kingston operated a fitness workshop below.

Jim Garvie and Rick Powers were behind the Exertek operation. They estimated that 1500 students browsed through the workshop which included a film, testing equipment, charts and general information on physical fitness.

Approximately 500 students were given tests which were administered by third year PHE students who were collecting data for a fitness study. These tests included body measurements, static strength, and vital capacity (lung volume).

Garvie, a physical education graduate student at Queen's, has been running Exertek for two years. The firm will present workshops and seminars to interested groups and will set up fitness programs for businesses.

The Ontario Mobile Fitness Van is a new program set up by the Ministry of Culture and Recreation. Phil Levesque, leader of the group which came to Queen's, said there were seven such vans in the province. They are usually co-sponsored and this particular group is run in conjunction with the Ottawa YM-YWCA.

Students had to book in advance to take the one-hour "FitTest Assessment Program". It was run on a one-to-one, student-counsellor basis, and consisted of several testing stations designed to measure a person's overall physical fitness.

The first step was to have blood-pressure checked. Levesque said this served as a method of screening out high blood-pressure participants.

Next, muscle strength was measured by a "grip strength dynamometer," tested on both hands. After this, the student's Vital Capacity is measured by forcing a deep breath into a machine to determine the volume of air the lungs can hold. Also measured is the amount you force out in the first second. A low percentage is in-

Flexibility is an important part of fitness. This is a demonstration of the capability of a fit body to assume the shape of the letter "U".

The next station was body measurements. Here they measure not only height and weight but they get really cruel and tell you how much of your body is fat. 12% to 16% is acceptable.

Then comes the fun stuff - the aerobics test. The counsellor attaches three electrodes to your upper body and connects you to a machine which measures your heart rate (electrocardiogram). The student then goes up and down two steps to the beat of taped music. This test is three minutes long and the student may do it up to three times at increasing speed depending on how well the heart is handling all this activity.

The final two tests are flexibility and sit-ups. After this there is consultation. The counsellor evaluates the participants' performance and rates him by standards ranging from below average up through above average and excellent on each test. A suggested training program is outlined so the student can either maintain his present physical condition or make the necessary improvements.

When asked what the best exercise is for losing one's "Molson Muscle", Levesque answered, "push-aways from the table." But he explained that crash dieting is not a good idea because a person has a 95% chance of putting that weight back on in the same length of time. The best method is to alter one's lifestyle. Either maintain one's present eating habits and exercise more, or else eat less and maintain the same amount of exercise.

The counsellor also hands out plenty of information including the "Fitness Wheel", which tells you the calories in all kinds of food and drink and the amount of exercise needed to burn those calories off. For those interested, it takes 8 minutes of running or 29 minutes of walking to burn off the 150 calories in a beer.

No, this is not a breathalyzer. It's a test for lung capacity.

World faces crisis, lecturer says

Staff

Unless a check is put on the accelerating growth of our technology and population, the world could face a crisis in the near future. This was the claim made by Jack Vallantyne, former Queen's Biology professor turned senior research scientist with the Federal Government's Environment Canada. Speaking Thursday in Stirling Hall, Vallantyne explained that our biosphere, in other words our total ecological system, can only support a certain amount of population and technology, a limit that the world is rapidly approaching. He stressed the need for a change in man's approach to world problems by saying, "Population and technology are chasing each other."

Rather than following the environmental outlook which has been predominant in the last ten years, Vallantyne advocates a biospheric approach, emphasizing the production of machinery with nature and man working together.

Vallantyne proposed three ways of accomplishing this transition. Firstly, a new biospheric ethic is needed for modern society. In the past, man has too often considered himself as too often considered himself as separate from his environment. Now he must realize that he has to be part of the environment in order to survive.

Vallantyne hopes that such an ethic would lead to more responsible behaviour from mankind. He compared mankind's relationship with the biosphere to the four sections of an orchestra: Nature, Education and Knowledge, Humane Groups, and Business, Finance, and Resource Industries. Before we are able to play in harmony, we must recognize each other, have elbow room to play, and find a conductor to coordinate the sections.

Vallantyne's second proposal was the setting up of a system of biosphere audits and a post similar to that of the Auditor General to review these audits. Each firm would be required by law to keep up-to-date biosphere records on its use and misuse of natural resources, which the Auditor could demand to see at any time.

Vallantyne would like to see the governments of Canada and the U.S. give the power of auditor to the International Joint Committee, a body that is presently investigating pollution in the Great Lakes Basin. Finally, he feels that all natural systems and objects should have legal rights so that a lawyer on their behalf can sue corporations and receive retribution for damage.

In conclusion, Dr. Vallantyne stated, "There are three reasons why humans act as they do: man's optimism; tradition and habit constraining us from change; and thirdly, on earth the dead do not speak." What is needed above all is cooperation between all groups—business, educational, and ecological—in the control of growth.

Court review to begin

by Julia Grunau

The seven-member AMS Court Review Committee met for the first time last week, and among their initial conclusions was a demand for increased student input and participation.

"The object of the review is to look at why it hasn't worked and see if it can become a more functional thing," according to Richard Binhammer, AMS Internal Affairs Commissioner. Dave Brown, President, added: "There's been concern expressed by students and administration, and we're going to take a look at the concerns and see how they can be mended."

Students can contribute to the review by either reading written briefs or giving planned speeches at the next review meeting on Nov. 1.

Binhammer estimates that the review will take months to complete, citing February as the target date. The length of time involved is justified, however, by Dave Brown, who declared: "It's one of the most important things we'll do this year. The Court has been in existence for over a hundred years and you can't change it in two weeks."

The result of the extensive revamping, Binhammer feels, should be "a more viable court type of system with more distinct guidelines, and students will be able to benefit more from it."

Rector candidates define duties

Elizabeth Dewar

Problems such as the tension this fall between Queen's students and Kingston police, or the unwelcomed installation of new seats in the Sidewalk Cafe, could have been avoided or mitigated through judicious intervention by a Queen's rector, according to Hugh Christie and Paul Tinari. Both Christie and Tinari have declared an intention to compete for the position.

Christie said "I think there would have been a role (for the rector) in the incidents this fall, although I don't know the insides of the story." Christie also suggested that the rector could act as "an ombudsman, on behalf of students in general," in cases such as the decision to install new coffee shop seats, when administrative decisions are imminent, but unknown to most students.

Christie stressed that he did not mean these comments as a criticism of previous rector Moe Chocola, who graduated last spring and resigned recently. Christie said both Chocola and his predecessor, Bruce Trotter, "did a tremendous job. That's one of the reasons the rector is listened to," he added.

Tinari said last week's bootlegging lines are "a perfect example of where the rector could play a significant part." Tinari added that if he were rector, he "would have gone to the trial and questioned the purposes behind the raid...and concerning the change of attitude. I would have asked permission to make a collection to help the students. After all, we're all guilty," he said.

The rector is the official student representative to the Board of Trustees. He or she is not attached to any faculty, campus group, student government or to the University administration. He is meant to be the students' independent representative to the Board of Trustees, and converse as an impartial mediator between conflicting groups.

Tinari emphasized the need for impartiality and independence of other student groups, and said he thought Christie's past connections with the AMS would be a disadvantage in a rector.

"The rector must be a dynamic individual who can act independently of any organization on campus," he added.

However, Christie said he did not think his past connections with the AMS would impair his independence as rector.

"I've certainly stepped out of that office, though I'm still interested in what's going on. But I don't breathe down the neck (of the present AMS executive) even though I don't agree with some of their decisions," he added.

Christie also said the recently revealed mismanagement of constable funds during his term in office "does not destroy any credibility that I have."

Fund mismanagement was "the result of a system that still has some kinks. There are bound to be problems with a turnover (in student government personnel) every year," he added.

Experience is an important advantage for a rector, Christie said. "I don't believe one can step into the job, not having a pretty good understanding" of the Senate, Senate Committees and the AMS, he explained, and added "it's easy to create wrong impressions and hard feelings simply by not being sensitive to the bodies you're dealing with." Christie said his experience attending Senate and Board of Trustee meetings, as well as working on the AMS, is one of the chief reasons he feels qualified for the job.

Tinari lists his two years of experience on Senate Committees as one of many reasons he feels he is qualified to be rector. He also included among his qualifications participation on several intercollegiate sports teams, bilingualism, an interest in long term problems such as alternative energy sources and "my capacity for original thought."

Both Christie and Tinari said the rector should be a leader, as well as a representative among students. Christie added, "I think there's a real role for officials to inform people, and pass on information that you've gleaned from having been in a different position." He perceives a need to "convince people that the opinions of elected officials has some weight. As AMS president, I went with the assumption that people agreed with our ability to make decisions," he added. As rector, he said, he would rely on his own opinions, as well as expressed student's opinions, and added "I'm not going to shy away from making decisions in what I think is the students' best interests."

Tinari made a slightly different comment on the rector's leadership role. "I would like to change the existing situation where, on so many issues, no decision is made, though I'm not going to name anyone," he said. Tinari would do this by facilitating student accessibility to the rector. And, he added, "I could use my connections on the Journal to publicize common student concerns so all students can be more aware."

Anyone wishing to run for the position of rector must hand in a nomination with the signatures and student numbers of 200 AMS members, as well as a candidate's letter of acceptance, to the Outer Council meeting on November 1. The election date has not yet been set.

OFS petition circulated

by Shelly Matson

The Ontario Federation of Students is circulating a petition concerned with the decline in the quality of education provided by colleges and universities throughout Ontario. The petition will be circulated to colleges and universities throughout the province this week.

The petition lays forth four proposals, the first being a demand for assurance that the level of funding necessary for maintaining quality in libraries, courses and programmes will not be eroded any further.

The second demand is that the freeze on tuition fees be extended, and that grant eligibility be restored to students who are automatically denied grants now.

Thirdly, the OFS petition calls for a public statement by the Ontario government assuring that the fiscal cutbacks suggested by the Winegard Report will not be implemented.

Finally, it opposes the Federal Government's intention to cut back on federal financial assistance to post-secondary education.

An emergency plenary concerning a stance on cutbacks will be held by the OFS on October 29 at Ryerson. AMS President Dave Brown will be attending and sees the plenary as "appropriate action."

The central concern of the plenary will be the feasibility of a demonstration at Queen's Park by the OFS in opposition to cutbacks.

The OFS had hoped to meet with Dr. Bette Stevenson before the plenary, but now this meeting will be delayed until late November. The AMS sees this delay as particularly unfortunate as the OFS will not be fully alerted to the Ontario government's position before the plenary.

"The whole key to it, the meeting with Dr. Stevenson is missing," said Brown.

Conforming to chairs and admin. decrees

by Ross Finnie

There are so many things "wrong" with the new furniture in the sidewalk cafe that important principles are called into question.

First of all, no student body ratified the change—that is a fact. For such a major decision to be made concerning our coffee shop without student approval is ludicrous and hardly "democratic".

Secondly, this is a poignant example of the individual's preferences being sacrificed to a "mass" product for sake of "efficiency".

Before "the change" the cafe was usually in a pleasant state of semi-disorder, with chairs and tables bunched together, trays left on tables, and pretty disgustingly stained seats. However, one could sit where one wanted, assume any comfortable posture, form groups as wished, or go outside when the weather was fine. In short, you could suit your own tastes and moods.

Not now! You sit where the chairs are, posture is determined by the plastic seats, groups are limited to four persons, and you will have a hell of a time trying to rip one of those "things" out of the floor to take it outside. You must now "enjoy" yourself in the manner dictated by those seats!

This is a blatant example of perverse standardization for the sake of "efficiency". The real costs of these "improvements" are relatively nebulous—i.e., individual preferences sacrificed for the sake of a common (efficient?) denominator, in this case, standard seating.

Obviously, "efficiency" is, on its own, desirable. Maybe plastic cutlery, paper plates, styrofoam cups, and pre-prepared food is somehow efficient. But the efficiency gains of those chairs do not outweigh the costs to personal tastes. Besides, if the old furniture was unsuitable, there were other alternatives besides the rubbish which was chosen. Administrative imaginations could not have been hard at work!

I think that coffee shop is an important part of a university. The sidewalk cafe was a great idea—a gathering place to sit and talk over a coffee and watch the people go by. A place to relax as one chose. The furniture change has altered all this and now we have simply another fast food outlet. It's hard to imagine this province and indeed to the Canadian tributing positively to the "atmosphere" or "feel" of Queen's—except for a bit of a chilling effect on the warmth which emanates when friends gather to enjoy a "cuppa" together.

All without student approval—all for misconstrued notions of efficiency. A boycott in protest is definitely in order to show that we care about our environment, and that we aren't simply passive recipients of decrees from bureaucrats on high.

This is our university and our coffee shop—let's make this perfectly clear to all who would ignore such pertinent facts!

The Quest

by Paul D. Tinari

In 1977 the Board of Trustees of Queen's University realized that financial constraints had become an unrelatable fact of life for the institution, and steps had to be taken to preserve the monetary security of the Queen's community.

Therefore, from the cutbacks effectuated by the Ontario Government, a new financial campaign project called Queen's Quest was hatched with the ultimate aim of raising $10-million in funds from the private sector over the period 1978-1983. The purpose of the campaign is to provide a thick financial cushion so that in the future a wide variety of future needs which will arise can be met, thus preserving the quality of education offered by the university.

There are many areas which will stand to benefit from the funds which Queen's Quest will make available. A very small listing of these would include scholarships, improved library facilities, support of student services, and academic development. Students stand to gain directly in most cases from the money which will be spent.

Principal Watts has stressed that the funds provided by the Ontario Government will soon be adequate to supply only the basic needs of the university and if Queen's is to keep her position as one of the leading Canadian institutions of higher learning, additional resources must be sought, and exploited. To use the words of Premier Davis, "Queen's has an outstanding record of distinctive performance and service to this province and indeed to the Canadian nation".

CFRC programming questioned

The Editor,

After reading the recent letters concerning CFRC, several questions come to mind. Firstly, what are the goals and objectives of Queen's Radio? Is CFRC to be primarily a broadcasting club (as seems to be the case), or is it a station functioning to serve the University community's needs and desires?

If the station is to serve the community at large, the directors are doing a poor job. A quick survey of three students, yielded the following responses when asked: "Where is CFRC on the radio dial?"

- 1) "What's CFRC?"
- 2) "I don't know offhand"
- 3) "Somewhere around C.K.L.C."

I suspect that a more thorough study would reveal similar results. It seems that CFRC is not a household word, while it certainly should be when one considers the alternative stations in Kingston. Why is nothing being done to remedy this situation? (I find it surprising to read that the Journal refuses to allocate space to inform us of our radio's weekly schedule.)

Who does listen to CFRC and what do they like and dislike? What would non-listeners like to hear? Without conducting on campus surveys I don't see how the directors of CFRC can set priorities in terms of programming. Does CFRC broadcast programs that attract too few listeners to justify their existence? Although CFRC should offer an alternative to the Kingston stations, there is little point in using scarce radio time to broadcast to the walls.

The performance objectives of Queen's Radio are a mystery to me. Would someone representing the management of CFRC come forth to explain them? If the fundamental one is to serve the University Community as a whole (and I hope it is), the directors of CFRC should examine their approaches to both publicity and programming.

Fitness Witness tries to change her own fate

by Julia Grunau

My friends and I are very jumpy about exercise these days. We have an enormous complex about it. They walk all over campus (a little), and I gamely try flexibility stretches in my room (but not very often), and we all feel guilty.

Continually we plead essays, critiques, bibliographies, anything so that we can avoid having to exert ourselves with a view to becoming fit and healthy. Yet, around us we can see former fellow sloths being converted, and we watch them playing tennis and running lustily about with sly envy. What is it that provokes us to eternal laziness? Why should we have to justify it? Why do we shrink down in mid-stride and hide our faces in our coat sleeves when a beaming young person bounces by with a racquet or some kind?

I used to remember the words of National Lampoon cartoonist Claire Bretecher when I felt queasy about my lassitude. She insists that exercise is bad for you because it makes you too tired. That is faint faith to cling to when you are constantly puffing and wheezing after a little run to a late class.

"Grunau," says a teacher. "Conjugate 'essere'."

"Puff, Puff," I protest. "Wheeze, wheeze."

"Grunau?"

"Pant, pant, pant," I gasp.

Something has to be done. I know. I shall think about it. I shall cogitate and eventually make up my mind.

And I think some food will help me, so I'm off to the munchie machines downstairs. I wonder...should I take the stairs or the elevator?

The Editor,

Having had the opportunity to view Bob Dylan in both Montreal and Toronto, I feel compelled to reply to Mr. Stratton's review of the Dylan concert. Although I can sympathize with Mr. Stratton's lament for the demise of Dylan as a "visionary, mystic, and above all poet," it does not signal the rise of Dylan as disco-king. After leaving the Montreal forum I also experienced disillusionment with Dylan's Las Vegas flourishes, tight ensemble of musicians and female chorus. However, upon seeing him in Toronto I realized my reaction was based on pre-conceived expectations rather than a musically uninspiring evening.

My Dylan's performance may not have been orthodox rock, but it was "powerful and evocative." As Dylan said, "remember The Band, well this isn't The Band," but rather a careful remodelling of his old songs. Mr. Stratton may claim that "16,000 people tapped their toes to 'Like A Rolling Stone' last Thursday, but I know for a fact there were some of us on our feet, cheering

Neighbourly Concern?

The Editor,

In the last few weeks I have been receiving an increasingly large number of phone calls relating to student behavior. Activities of certain students have marred our relations with the community. Queen's is in a unique position, in that the campus is an integral part of the city. This makes it especially important that we remember our responsibilities to our neighbours.

By way of example, students returning from the football games at West campus have been in the habit of throwing each other through the hedges of homes along Union street. Long after you have forgotten this senseless act, the residents are faced with the prospect of repairing a hedge that may have taken years to grow.

The citizens of Kingston have been tolerant and appreciative of Queen's students. Many of us have reciprocated with long hours of time spent in the service of the community. Legal Aid, the Student Volunteer Bureau, TAK, and the Engineers peanut drive are but a few examples.

Obviously, the A.M.S. should not be paternalistically monitoring every student activity. However, it is our responsibility to remind students of their obligations as citizens and good neighbours. Try and imagine what would happen if people acted the way that we sometimes do in your home town. Football days are especially problematic. Perhaps a bit of restraint is called for. Damaging property adds little to our good times, but the damage done is immeasurable.

Sincerely,
Dave Brown
Pres. A.M.S.

Padre Laverty points to importance of rectorship

The Editor,

While recognizing that for today's students the story of this University begins with their arrival, the statement about the Rectorship (on page one, Tuesday's Journal) that "the office was regarded as an honour rather than an active position" must not go unchallenged.

Leonard W. Brockington, Rector magnificus, serving an unprecedented seventh consecutive term when he died in 1966, faithful in his attendance at Board of Trustees meetings, wise counsellor, eloquent and effective as a champion of student concerns, was a guide and a landmark in this place. For a generation he immersed himself in the life of Queen's University, giving himself unswervingly to her best interests and serving her students with discernment and devotion.

He called us passionately, and always eloquently, to the study "of things and their forces of men and their ways." As we think of him we call to mind Harold Nicolson's words concerning Edmund Burke's "surpassing ability to add definition and colour to the unformulated feelings of many thousand less articulate human beings." Among all the honours which came to him in a long and distinguished career, he cherished most of all the office of Rector of Queen's University. For our part, Queen's cherished him as a great Tribune and faithful friend.

Sincerely
A.M. Laverty, Padre
H.R.S. Ryan, Faculty of Law

Nothing to lose but your fear

The Editor,
I am taking this opportunity to inform Queen's women that the Self-Defence course, WENDO, has not been permanently shelved. It has been rescheduled for January 20-21, 1979, and registration will be held in December. Anytime before then women are free to contact Ms Sue Bolton of the Phys. Ed center, with suggestions they may have, re a better weekend, or advertising techniques for this course.

If you show your interest by participating, the course will be run on a regular, semi-annual basis. Women of Queen's, you have nothing to lose but your fear! A course in basic but effective self-defence techniques can give you the confidence you need to walk freely, anytime, anywhere, alone.

Linda Elliott

have an affair with an ArtSci, and gain a good friend in Meds, all information gleaned from Candlelighting, a member of the male half of the species muttered disgustedly, "Are they still doing that?" I'm sure a lot of girls who missed Candlelighting felt equally disgusted about such "old tribal rites".

The same feeling was prevalent at an Outer Council meeting last year, when the merits of Suzy-Q Week were discussed. A male speaker got up and argued that women have been downgraded and trod upon for centuries, and that Suzy-Q Week was just a continuation of such humiliation. Horsefeathers! At the time, I felt like getting up and saying "Aren't you being a bit domineering and arrogant yourself, in suggesting that you can speak for women?" but, being a lowly Frosh and totally over-awed by university governmental procedure, I did not.

The point is, traditions like Candlelighting and Suzy-Q Week are only degrading and disgusting to those who still view them as a put-down of women. The rest of us can accept such things as they really are - chances to have a little bit of fun.

After 89 years, nothing holds a candle to it

RUSH

by Brent Lavictoire

Two weeks ago Canadian rock group Rush began a tour which will eventually take them to the United Kingdom, Germany and several other European countries. The tour should take almost a year to complete. With several tons of sophisticated sound and lighting equipment the project is the most ambitious ever undertaken by a Canadian rock band.

Following closely on the heels of their newest release, Hemispheres, Rush's tour began in Kingston on October 14. They will tour Canada for approximately two months and spend another two in the United States before leaving for overseas.

With last year's release, A Farewell to Kings, Rush vaulted to the fore as Canada's premiere rock band. Last year's tour was almost as extensive as their present venture but lacked the international exposure. The European dates on this tour represent a growing interest in Canadian music that many foreign audiences have expressed.

After the opening concert in Kingston we were able to talk with Geddy Lee, bass and keyboards player, about their present tour, the status of rock music in Canada, and the Canadian music industry. The following interview reveals an intent artist, concerned for the future of music in Canada.

Madrigal

When the dragons grow too mighty
To slay with pen or sword
I grow weary of the battle
And the storm I walk toward
When all around is madness
And there's no safe port in view
I long to turn my path homeward
To stop awhile with you
When life becomes as barren
And as cold as winter skies
There's a beacon in the darkness
In a distant pair of eyes
In vain to search for order
In vain to search for truth
But these things can still be given
Your love has shown me proof

Music by Lee and Lifeson
Lyrics by Peart

We had expected to interview a "typical" hyper rock star; instead we were treated to an enjoyable conversation with an easily expressive and devoted musician.

All too often in the past, it seems, Canadian bands have had to gain international recognition before they are accepted here. You were part of the mass exodus to the States earlier in the Seventies. Any regrets about that early decision?

If we had tried to make it in Canada we wouldn't have because of the fact that there was no one who believed in us here; we had to go elsewhere. It wasn't a matter of choice.

At the time we were going south there wasn't nearly the touring situation there is now. We were still pretty immature in that respect compared to the United States. Now I think it's possible to be a Canadian success and then look for success abroad.

Max Webster, I think, are a band proving to be an example of that. They're very, very popular in Canada now and they're going to the United States to enter the market there as well. I think it can be done. There are a lot more good bands that are coming along in Canada and they're worthy of Canadian success.

Where do these problems stem from? What has made it so hard for Canadian bands to be commercially successful here?

It's a big country, people are very spread out, media is not connected like it is in the United States. It's getting better and I think it is easier than what it was when we started out four years ago.

Why was Kingston chosen as the site to launch your new tour?

It was available. I'd like to say it was because Kingston was the place we wanted to go to but it was just very convenient for us. We didn't want to work in Toronto, we wanted to get outside, some place where we could spend a few days in a hall, work the show out slowly and put things together and Kingston seemed very suitable at the time.

How long did you spend here getting ready?

We were here three days and we rehearsed in Toronto for a week before that. There's a lot of physical things to get together. The three days helped a lot, next time we'll use more.

A lot of things came together at the last moment. My keyboard set up was being repaired and didn't arrive until an hour before the show.

On stage I realized they hadn't put any lights on it so I couldn't see anything. I'm going to switch switches and I couldn't see what I was doing, screaming at my roadie to hold flashlights for me. It was one of those first nights where everything is chaotic.

When was the last time you took an extended break from recording and touring?

We tour eight to nine months of the year. After we recorded Hemispheres we had six or seven weeks off which is the longest break we've ever taken. You have to go through a whole new reorientation everytime you go on tour.

How is the tour scheduled?

This tour could last up to a year. Our scheduling work outs that we'll be playing three or four days in a row and then taking a day off; every four and a half weeks we'll take a week off. Otherwise we'd be cooked. In the last tour we overworked ourselves. We're not going to make the same mistakes again.

What is the status of a possible Japan tour?

It's under discussion right now. Japan is apparently a very good place to play, great audiences, and the trip itself would be a big experience.

definitely the place for us to work. Nothing to do there but go to the pub and play darts, or work; so you work.

You've shown a very definite progression as a band. What were some of your major early influences?

There were a lot of things go down between our first and second album. A lot of things Alex and I wanted to get into but John, our previous drummer couldn't do those things, his head wasn't there.

Neil was right into it. He had a catalytic effect on us. He had some very positive ideas and he helped reaffirm our ideas. We gelled as a mass. It certainly was a new face on the band.

Rarely do record companies allow a group very much freedom on their first albums. How did you work around that problem?

We were originally on "Moon" records, a smaller version of Anthem, which was basically us and our management. The terms we set down when we started were that no one was going to dictate to us. We could get away with what we wanted to do, so that after our initial success everything came naturally.

After four years of intensive work together, have there been any personality conflicts?

No, none. Our personalities blend really well; it's surprising but true.

You've been stuck with the label "space rock". Does that bother you?

That doesn't bother me at all.

Often your lyrics are reminiscent of Ayn Rand's fiction, perhaps this contributes to such a label. Also, the image of "Cinderella Man" is unique in this age of anarchy dominated rock and roll. What are some of the influences that shape your songs?

"Cinderella Man", actually, comes from a Frank Capra statement in the film "Mr. Deeds Goes To Town". That's what that is all about. Ayn Rand figures pretty heavily in a lot of our lyrics. Her presence is certainly felt.

How about the future of the concept album with regards to yourself and other bands?

People are really turning away from concept albums. We seem to be one of the last bands that's still doing them. On this last album,

Hemispheres we've carried the concept to its full potential. I really don't know where we'll go from here. I kind of think it will be something different. We may start writing shorter tunes.

A lot of people feel that the audience won't stand for "concept" bands and music. So far we haven't found that to be so. Our music, although it is conceptual in its nature, is still very raw, giving us an edge. There's a lot of energy there.

Bands like Yes have gone away from the concept album, their audience deserted them. We're comfortable with the concept format. We've done it for a long time and it's been growing for a number of years.

As a three-man band you must be limited in what you can do in the studio and present it faithfully on stage, especially since you're dealing with involved concepts in your last few albums.

Our emphasis has been more on melody in the last three albums so that we have to be more creative on stage and in our recording technique. It can't be all solo work or else it turns into a Cream effect. We don't want to be like Cream; we want to have a fuller sound.

How about your FM exposure and the present status of FM in Canada?

Toronto radio has been very good to us. Our airplay elsewhere is very minimal to fair at best, we don't get a phenomenal amount of play but it's by nature of what we do that we don't. We're not an AM oriented band in the first place and number two our tunes are very long and raw. When we first went to the states we were fortunate in that we caught the tail end of real underground radio. It's sort of died down now.

It's all very fast, hip money-making FM stations now. FM has gotten to the point where AM was five years ago. It's really changed. There are some small stations starting to pop up now that are going the underground route. I'm hoping that will really come around again, but FM radio and its original concept has really died.

The only thing that's going to replace them is smaller stations that have been playing MOR, or whatever, finally saying, well look, there's a gap between what FM radio is and what people want FM radio to be. Maybe some people will take a chance and bring back the original FM format. I hope that's true.

Price brilliant in Wilde portrayal

by Julian Cunningham
with many thanks to Gillian Dobias
To my knowledge, there are, at most, five or six actors alive in the world today who can overcome the gruelling challenges of the one man show. Last Friday night, in John Gay's Divisions and Delights, Vincent Price proved beyond a doubt that he is one of these men.

All the inexorable charm and stultifying arrogance of Oscar Wilde were represented by Mr. Price in what must be described quite simply as a tour de force, an exquisite theatrical gem.

He is a charmer, a man with the ability to cup an audience in the palm of his hand, and command its course single-handedly for an entire evening.

The audience were slightly bemused when he first appeared onstage in a gray velveteen morning suit coloured by an enormous emerald green tie, carrying a large yellow sunflower. They had come to see Vincent Price. He gave them the dandy Oscar Wilde, a man of often-ignored depth, popularized mainly by his liquid eloquence and razor-sharp wit.

"My name is Oscar Fingall O'Flaherty Wills Wilde," he began with dead-pan relish, launching into some of the anecdotes which have prompted many to regard Wilde as the greatest conversationalist the English language has ever known.

His comments on American society quickly won the delighted approval of his audience.

"Americans have no lower classes." "They have never quite forgiven Europe for being discovered first." "He (the customs officer) asked me if I had anything to declare" (indignant glance). "Nothing, I said, but my genius."

The full comic effect of this play depends almost exclusively upon the delivery of the lines. Mr. Price made impeccable use of his voice, employing a stilted upper register to set up a joke, reverting to an electrifying actor's bass for the delivery. It never failed.

From the ridiculous to the sublime. From a predominantly humorous first act, to the depths of Oscar Wilde's tormented mind in the second, and the culmination of the consummate actor's talents exploding, in a whisper, on the stage of death.

Some pastoral piano music, then Wilde enters and opens the second act with lines from the character of Algernon Moncrieff in The Importance of Being Earnest. "I don't play accurately. Anyone can play accurately. But I play with wonderful expression."

The man who "offends everyone."

Wilde in America: "He [the customs officer] asked me if I had anything to declare" (indignant glance). "Nothing, I said, but my genius."

Indiscriminately, gradually lost his sarcastic edge, becoming introspective, vulnerable and bitter in recounting the court case that ultimately resulted in his death.

The programme informs us of the "ear infection and other maladies" under which Wilde is performing, in this imaginary lecture set in Paris one year before he died. The infection was the result of a fall sustained at Reading Gaol.

He tells us how he took the

Behind the calm veneer lurks Wilde's deadliest weapon - his sarcasm powerful Lord Queensberry to court for making slanderous public statements against an illicit relationship between Wilde and Queensberry's son Lord Alfred Douglas. How he was sentenced to two years hard labour for engaging in "a love that dares not speak its name" homosexuality.

Mr. Price recited brilliantly from The Ballad of Reading Gaol, a poem Wilde wrote in prison, a monument to the human spirit. Through Price, the poem became a living thing, tangible, and terrifying.

The end of the play found the audience almost as unprepared as had the beginning. After pondering

I asked him if art was still his first love. In a raspy bass he replied, "Yes" his finger indicating the stage, now cold and silent. "Yes. But this is art too."

briefly on the possibility of living on into the twentieth century (Wilde died in 1900), he clutched his ear, weakly grasped his armchair, and said blandly, "The evening is done. Thank you and goodnight." He left the stage. Hesitantly, the applause rose, and the ovation lasted. But there was uneasiness in the audience as to whether they had actually seen what they had paid to see. Probably not.

Sadly, the evening was over. Gillian and I stayed in the theatre with a faint hope that we might briefly see this man who had held us spellbound the last two hours. Fifteen minutes later, he emerged from one of the stage doors. Finally his eyes fell on us, and an enormous hand reached out and engulfed mine, warm and inviting.

He was wearing blue jeans, denim running shoes, and an oversized navy blue overcoat. He was visibly tired.

Weakly, I asked him if art was still his first love. In a raspy bass, he quietly replied "Yes" (his finger indicating the stage now cold and silent). "Yes. But this is art too."

In conversation, he makes you feel as though no one exists but you, and him. This is the gift that makes him great, both on and off the stage.

His humility was baffling. As we followed him out of the theatre, Gillian stopped to ask him if he would sign her programme. I compulsively followed suit.

"Thank you," he said. "I'm so glad you enjoyed the programme."

"It's been an honour," I said, as we floated away on a cloud of disbelief and awe, this unforgettable night.

The ambivalence in a comic genius haunted by his unyielding past

Trial and errors: Judging the C.B.C.

by Nick Gray

It is the fourth year. The pilgrimage to Canada's great White Elephant has begun. The C.R.T.C. hearings into the renewal of the C.B.C.'s broadcasting license once again hits the forefront of the news. With 166 submissions from concerned organizations and individuals the two weeks of hearings turned into an incredible dissection of Canadian society. Imagine, delving into that grey area that constitutes the Canadian psyche. Wow! The clamourings can be equated to seeing the dissection of one's stomach and alphabet soup flow prodigiously forth.

Everyone has an idea of how the Corporation could be better handled. Those mandarins in power at the C.B.C. have reams of facts and figures, philosophies, and excuses that justify the current state of affairs. Meanwhile, events plod along. Audiences remain loyal to those idiot, crass, plastic, pretentious, meaningless, celluloid shows that are churned out at a fantastic rate south of the border. Either that or watching hockey or football hoping to see some poor slob collapse in the supreme effort of individual endeavour.

The C.R.T.C. sits in paternal, banal court listening to all with characteristic complacency. But what will the Commission do? They may well censure the C.B.C. for failing to live up to its mandate but they will not revoke its license. After all we are all aware that something is better than nothing, right? What ever happened to inquisitiveness? Where are the days of the inquisition? What happened to inspired criticism? Gone! The nation needs to be entertained. The vehicle is unimportant. We are a homogenous society in North America. Why try and pretend otherwise!

What is the C.B.C. proposing:

- * to broaden the base of French language television service across Canada
- * to expand French and English A.M. and F.M. radio service
- * provide improved regional programming
- * reschedule the national news so that potential audience is greater than the current 20%

* to use Canadian feature films and independent production studios to increase the Canadian content of the network programming

* create a new television station that would run in the evenings without ads. In short, it is an attempt to turn the tide of regressionism in Canada: To try and come up with better quality and quantity in its programming; to stop the Americanization of our country. Money? Sure it's tight but it can be done. We have the means, all we need now is the justification.

But the public doesn't care. No, Al Johnson, though your motivation is pure and your reasoning well founded on the principles of power politics, the public doesn't care. Canadians don't want to see more on the Inuit or more of The Fifth Estate. You have to cater to the needs; the law of supply and demand. Everything will work out.

Those interest groups who went before the commission to condemn you are crazy. They don't understand how, why, or when you are going to achieve these miracles. Besides they are right and you are wrong - didn't you know that? Hell, the Government understands. They just finished cutting $71 million from your budget. They have confidence in you. The government sees no basis for your anger. Go ahead slap their wrists. Terrific!

The critics all have good points but unfortunately they are divided. Remember they all have the same purist motivation that you have. Besides they are divided with no consensus. If you concede to one, the next thing you know you will have to concede to all of them. No matter - listen to all, noo, and throughout ignore them. You have had everything levelled at you from political interference in the press to prejudice. It is always your fault. Anyhow you've made it through haven't you?

Think of all that work you did getting ready for the onslaught. Think of all those hours of anguish and those endless sleepless nights. It's over. It wasn't so bad was it? The commission said nothing; your critics are divided, the report won't be released for months and by that time everything will have been forgotten.

□ You are making the best of a bad situation. It's all over but the questioning...

Autumn brings forth Bradstreet

by Sandy Graham

In Kingston, there are three sure-fire ways of recognizing autumn, should you lose track of the seasons. You'll know it's here when the winos on Princess Street button up their overcoats and let their white stubble grow like caterpillars anticipating the fall when pumpkins grin crazily from the turrets of King Street's overly ambitious mansions, and when Dave Bradstreet crunches once again through the fallen leaves to Grant Hall.

The annual appearance of Queen's favourite "frost king" will take place this Sunday evening at 8 p.m. Special guest star will be Rob Young.

Since his last visit, Bradstreet has released his second A&M album, "Dreaming in Colour", to mixed reaction. Some speak of it as representing the emancipation of a folkie, the revelation of long repressed energies and talents; die-hard folkies, recalling Bradstreet's past in the coffee houses and folk clubs, regard the record as commercial in the extreme. To be sure, the album is a substantial departure for Mr. Bradstreet. Yet, no firm directions are given us, no clues as to where we will go from here. To my mind at least, "Dreaming in Colour" seems to be too well-orchestrated too contrived, for a natural progression. We had not the least hint of its style in anything Bradstreet did previous to its release. Press copy comparing the impact of "Dreaming" to that of Dylan's "Highway 61 Revisited" leads me to suspect that, on vinyl at least, Bradstreet is no longer his own master. We could believe on his first album, the rainbows he painted "with only these blues"; the colours of his present dreams seem as flat as the disc they were recorded on.

Still, none of this has much bearing on the concert we may expect for, as I've often stressed, Bradstreet is a completely different entertainer in person. His patter and presentation exude a warm friendliness, the songs a crisp sensitivity and importance. His smooth tenor complements a well-tuned, obedient guitar making for some fine studies in musical architecture. Obviously, having paid his dues at Ryerson's School of Architecture and in the demanding environment of places like Bitter Grounds, Bradstreet has acquired a real talent for designing music.

So, what to expect on Sunday? No doubt, an excellent show. But I can't say whether or not we'll hear anything new in "the key of blue". Perhaps, another one of his persuasive performances will convince us of the authenticity of his novel colours.

Bradstreet: bringing blueprints to life

Theatre 5: a lacklustre performance of Candida

by Fiona Grieve

Sometimes the countdown to performance night runs too quickly. Insufficient rehearsal marred Theatre 5's Candida last Saturday night. Although entertaining, their performance lacked polish.

This was my first trip to Theatre 5. The director's chairs they seat you in are comfortable, and being part of an audience of less than 100, give an intimacy and relaxed atmosphere to the theatre. For this kind of setting, actors should be a bit more subtle with makeup.

The first act, introducing the good-hearted socialist, Rev. James Morrell (Gordon Robertson) and his household, was not quite tight enough. There were some line problems (surprising, it being the fifth night) as well as an awkwardness in the movements of many of the characters.

However, things ran much more smoothly for the second and third acts. Dialogue flowed much more naturally between actors and action was well-sustained from here on. Yet the play never quite got beyond the tenseness left over from the beginning of the performance.

All criticism aside, John Taylor deserves credit for his fine performance of the weak, ineffectual poet who shocks people for his outspokenness in private. Valerie Robertson's Candida was almost too sensible, but very credible and consistent throughout.

To sum up my impressions, Candida was enjoyed by the audience for its witty lines but because of a few loose ends the troupe did not quite achieve a good performance.

Gallery offers unique display

by Peggy Walker

If you ever find yourself in the vicinity of the City Hall with some spare time, pay a visit to the Gallery of Fine Arts at 72 Johnson Street. This pleasant gallery, run by Francoise Duncan an instructor in French at Queen's, is open on market days. The owner has taken an active interest in the Canadian art world with selections by David Brown, Geoff Butler and Robert Blenden.

This gallery is presently exhibiting the works of a local artist, Muriel Mason, which will continue until October 28. Although she has experimented with various techniques such as pastels, candlewax with watercolours, and pen and ink, she always reverts back to her favourite medium of the dry brush technique with watercolours to achieve fine, delicate details. She is a self-taught artist who has tried to express her avid interest in nature and horticulture through her work as illustrated in "Crabapples". A successful still-life is "Study in Amber and Gold" (a study of onions, bagels and a glass) in which she has managed to convey the subtle colours, lighting and textures of the subject.

But it is the presentation of these artworks which makes this gallery a unique phenomena in Kingston. Francoise Duncan has furnished the rooms with fascinating antiques and pottery collections which provide a perfect setting to view the Muriel Mason exhibition.

City to City: Gerry Rafferty reviewed by Brent Lavitoe

Gerry Rafferty is the type of recording artist who defies concise categorization. This may be partially owing to the range of mediums Rafferty touches on his debut album City to City.

The singles from the album, "Baker Street" and "Right Down the Line" present alluring combinations of reggae/calypso and pop-rock, a sophisticated and successful mixture. Rafferty's island sound infects other cuts from the album as well. "Island" presents the same vein and features a meaty sax solo from jazzman Raphael Ravenscroft.

On other songs an entirely different performer emerges. The good time Rafferty appears on the title track, "City to City" when fiddle, harmonica, banjo and pedal steel guitar combine to add a definite country twang.

"The Ark", perhaps the album's most outstanding cut utilizes the country sound as well and introduces the lonely traveller motif which dominates the album. "Stealin' Time", changes the pace again as the mood switches to low lights and close dancing. "Matti's Rag" is a brilliant example of modern ragtime expounding "them homesick blues". The almost too long "Whatever's Written in Your Heart" continues the lost love theme in a gospel-folk fusion and "Home and Dry" breaks away again with Rafferty's closest approach to rock and roll at its base level. To complete the complexity of City to City, "Waiting for the Day" bears a remarkable resemblance to the airy rock and roll of Ambrosia.

Despite the diversity of City to City, it possesses a unique singular texture; Rafferty's mellowing vocals tie everything together tactfully. It's not a hard album to take at any time. Classify this one easy listening.

Hemispheres: Rush reviewed by Brent Lavitoe

One of the last remaining bands to utilize the "concept album" format, Rush's newest album presents a close twin to A Farewell to Kings. Not only is the epic "Cygnus X-1" concluded on the title track, their songs bear a close resemblance to the themes presented on their previous album. "Circumstances" presents another sadly moving tale of an idealistic youth's loss of innocence, reminiscent of "Cinderella Man" and "Madrigal". "The Trees" comments on many of our present social realities with the same scathing view of spoiled innocence.

While the band has retained much of the thematic drive of Farewell their musical progression is undeniable. Hemispheres is a well paced album with a great deal of vibrancy, a compromise that is hard to attain and which Rush needed badly. Earlier Rush albums have tended to drive the listener forward with unchecked acceleration, pausing momentarily only for rests. This new cadence in Rush's music enhances their story line and improves the dynamic flow of their latest release.

proved also. Alex Lifeson has finally learned how to use an acoustic guitar, helping him to control his electric model very effectively. On previous albums and on last year's tour it was evident that Alex's guitar simply ran away with him at times. His new view and manipulation of the guitar as an instrument and not just a loud toy represents the band's greatest and most needed improvement. Geddy Lee has introduced more keyboards to the group's music, another welcome feature, and Neil Peart is still the premier drummer in his field. Having paused to develop a theme, Rush certainly has not stagnated musically.

Perhaps the greatest aspect of Rush's brand of fantasy rock and roll is their lyrics. Consider: "Let the truth of Love be lighted/Let the love of Truth shine clear/Sensibility/Armed with sense and liberty/With the Heart and Mind united/In a single perfect sphere".

Hey guys, this is supposed to be rock and roll.

Gaels squeak by Gaiters into first

by Donald MacKinnon

A forty-one yard punt single by Tim Wardrop with no time remaining on the clock gave the Queen's Golden Gaels a thrilling 15 to 14 comeback victory against a tough Bishop's Gaiters squad in Lennoxville, Quebec last Saturday. Wardrop, who only minutes before had boomed a 48 yard punt single into the end zone to tie the score, came through under pressure by dropping the ball eight yards deep into the end zone. The Gaiter punt returner, though instructed to punt the ball out, ran instead, and was hauled down one yard short of the goal line. Their sixth victory in as many starts gives the Gaels home field advantage for the playoffs.

The one point victory eked out by the Gaels was the closest that they have come this year to losing. Queen's victory can largely be laid at the feet of their tenacious defense and Wardrop's clutch punting. For the offense, it was a game of lost opportunities. The Gaels fumbled when they were inside the Bishop's twenty; they failed to score after earning a second and goal from the one yard line; and open receivers were being overthrown in the end zone. It looked for a while as if the game was slipping out of the Gaels' reach.

Queen's opened well, marching down field behind Marinucci's and Manaster's great running, but Bob Mullen was unable to find an open Bob O'Doherty in the end zone from eight yards out. The Gaels settled for a 15 yard Brad Thompson field goal at 5:58 of the opening quarter.

After scoring a single on a wide field goal attempt in the first quarter, Bishop's did not get another scoring opportunity until midway through the second quarter when they pounced on a Bob O'Doherty fumble on the Gaels' six yard line. That led to a Bishop's touchdown, and with the convert, the score became 8 to 3 for Bishop's with 8:38 to play in the half.

The Gaels replied with a single off a wide field goal attempt. The Gaels' next field goal attempt came when they had only a foot to go for a first down. More surprising was the fact that it was a fake. The razzle dazzle play failed, however, and the Gaels came up empty.

With only thirteen seconds showing on the clock, Nick Araki, Bishop's 6'6" basketball player turned football player, booted a 45 yard field goal.

After a very enjoyable half time show put on by the Queen's bands which left many of the Bishop's fans speechless, the Gaels took the field trailing 11 to 4. Sporadic cries of "let's prove we're number one" could be heard from the Gaels' bench.

Early in the third quarter, Dick Bakker, who played perhaps his finest game of the season, sacked the Bishop's quarterback, who coughed up the ball to Bruce Balson. Bruce rammed to the 23 before he was dragged down. Two plays later, Bob Mullen passed to Marinucci who was not brought down till the five. Yet the offense, which got the ball as far as the one, was unable to score.

Bottled up by a tough Gael's defense, Bishop's punted to Hugh Gallagher who returned the ball to the 38. John Lynch came into the game for the Gaels and four plays later, at 8:11 of the third quarter, he floated a 25 yard pass into Bob O'Doherty's hand in the end zone. Thompson's convert was wide, so the Gaels remained one point down, trailing 11 to 10. When the Gaels gained possession on the Bishop's 21 after a bad punt, it looked like the break the Gaels needed. On the next play, Dave Marinucci fumbled and it was recovered by Bishop's. A couple of plays later, Bruce Balson sacked Kne (the Gaiters' quarterback) forcing a punt, but dislocated his shoulder doing it. The play left Bishop's on their own five. Another poor punt gave the Gaels good field position again and at 4:19 of the fourth quarter, Brad Thompson kicked a 30 yard field goal to move the Gaels in front 13 to 11.

Four completions in a row moved the Gaiters (for only the second time in the second half) across the center field stripe and into scoring position. At 7:53 Araki kicked a 34 yard field goal to move Bishop's back out in front 14 to 13.

With Bob Mullen back in at quarterback, the Gaels tried a play they've hardly used this season, the option. Mullen pitched to O'Doherty who turned the corner and raced 27 yards before being knocked heavily out of bounds. (Carried off the field after the play, O'Doherty suffered strained knee ligaments, which may keep him out of next week's game against Carleton.) Three plays later, Wardrop boomed a 48 yard punt deep into the endzone for a single point. There was only 2:37 left to play in the game.

Needing a victory, Bishop's tried the old "reverse with a bomb on the end of it". The receiver, who was behind the secondary, made the catch but he was out of bounds.

With under a minute to play, Fred

Jim D'Andrea (#26) lays a hit on a Bishop's back while John Vernon closes in from the side. MacKinnon

Prinzen, filling in for the injured Bruce Balson, blitzed from his corner linebacking spot and sacked Kne for a 9 yard loss, back to his own 33. On the next play, the Bishop's punter tried to run with the ball but the Gaels were alert and he was snowed under on the 35. Three plays later, with the ball being scrimmaged on the 33, and "the guys giving me lots of time", Wardrop was again called upon to punt. As the clock ran out, he got the ball away. The rest is history.

It was a game, as Dick Bakker put it, "that was bad for the heart."

If there had been a game ball around, I think it would have gone to the defense. As well as the line quarterback sacks the Gaels defense blocked a punt and a field goal and returned a fumble over twenty-five yards. In the second half, the Gaiters were limited to just one field goal.

As offensive tackle Peter Sops ruefully pointed out, "It's nice to have a great defense behind you."

Though Bob Mullen had an off day passing (soreness in his arm probably contributed to his sub-standard five for 13) and Tony Manaster'sky ran well for the second week in a row, the Gaels offense as a whole didn't look sharp. But every team has off days, and as assistant coach Bill Sparrow pointed out, "the difference between a very good team and a solid team, is that when the very good team has an off day, it still wins."

This year's Gaels are winners, and they are now unashamedly setting their sights on the College Bowl. The first step on that road will be taken this Saturday at 1:00 when the Gaels meet the Carleton Ravens at George Richardson Stadium.

Golf ends in 5th

by Frank Dixon
The Queen's Golf team closed out its season on October 6, coming fifth in Ontario in the finals, hosted by Queen's this year at Dalewood G.C. in Port Hope. They were the defending champions. This year's team was composed by Gord Morland, Dag Enhorning, Neil Cunningham, John Kutkovicus, and Frank Dixon. The team was coached by Jake Edwards and Al Lenard.

The team played in four tournaments. On Sept. 18, the team travelled to St. Catharines for the Brock Invitational. Queen's came 4th in this event out of 7 teams. The tourney was won by the U. of Waterloo. The tournament was played in a torrential downpour - an occurrence not unusual in fall university golf. On Sept. 25 the team visited Waterloo for the U. of Waterloo Invitational. The team placed 4th in this event out of 8 teams. U. of Waterloo also won this event, as they dominated on their home course.

Next came the semi-final tournament held at the Cutten Club, hosted by U. of Guelph, on Sept. 27-29. Queen's placed fifth out of eleven schools represented, capturing the final qualifying spot for the finals. This tourney was played in near-perfect sunny conditions. York U. qualified first.

The finals were held at Dalewood, Port Hope on Oct. 4-6. After the first day, Queen's was only two shots off the lead, as the team posted 303 combined between the four best players, while leading with 301, under perfect scoring conditions. The second day's play was plagued by rain, wind and cold; Queen's skyrocketed to 331 among the four best, falling to last place. The OUAA Golf Championship was won by University of Toronto with 615 - one shot ahead of York U.

provided by Frank Dixon and Gord Morland at the semi-finals, as both players finished with 150 totals over the two days, good for a share of fifth place. Mike McBride of York won with 145. At the finals, Dag Enhorning displayed brilliant form as he shot a par 71, with the help of a record-tying 32 on the back nine. Dag had four consecutive birdies as he shot the lowest round of the tournament. Neil Cunningham also showed he could play, shooting a solid 74. Unfortunately, the bad weather adversely affected Queen's scores the second day, but Enhorning still finished fifth overall with a 153 total. Dave Deasley of Toronto won with 147, in a playoff over Western's Tony Cope.

The Queen's Golf team will be touring in the United States in May of 1979. A series of friendly matches with schools in North Carolina and Ohio is planned to start off the new season.

The team looks strong for next year - with all but Gord Morland sure to return. Experience gained this year will certainly help. Other strong

Queen's track and field team OUAAC champions again

by Jeff Bellinger

The Queen's men's Track and Field team successfully defended its Ontario Universities Athletic Association Championship this weekend at George Richardson Stadium. Head coach Rolf Lund was extremely happy with what he called "a tremendous team effort". The three captains of the team, Peter Becke, Jim Wilson, and Adam Shoemaker, were presented the Tait McKenzie Memorial Trophy emblematic of OUAAC track and field supremacy. At a dinner following the meet, Peter Becke presented the trophy to coach Lund on behalf of the entire team. Lund accepted on behalf of all the coaches who molded this team in to championships.

Queen's, although not highly favoured (especially after the losses of Jeff Starwick, one of the best sprint players are waiting in the wings - look out especially for former OUAAC medalist Mark Siemonsen and Jamie Heward, a strong Montreal amateur - both of whom chose not to play this year. Queen's is a perennial contender in OUAAC Golf, and is a threat to recapture the title again next year. The finals will be held at Glen Abbey G.C. in Oakville, home of the Canadian Open.

men in the OUAAC, and Ian Gale, a top distance runner) going into the meet, managed to out-point its nearest rival, University of Toronto, by over forty points. For the first time in many, many years, the meet was not a two-way race but rather an all-out battle between four teams: Queen's, U. of T., Waterloo, and McMaster. This intense competition makes the men's victory all the more sweeter.

After the competition was over, the Queen's men had amassed eight gold medals - six on the track and two in the fields. Charlie Hitchon won the 800 m hurdles, Jim Morrison the 110m hurdles, Chris Reid the 400m hurdles, and Jeff Bellinger the 3000m steeplechase. The 4x100m relay team of Tony Postorero, Peter Becke, Jim Wilson and Duncan Card won, while the 4x400m relay team of Tony Postorero, Chris Reid, Jim Wilson, and Charlie Hitchon did the same. On the field, Mark Fudge outvaulted the field in the pole vault for gold, while Mark Evans won himself his gold in the discus.

Many other people did exceptionally well and to serve justice to the entire team, the Journal will run a more detailed article in the next issue. Congratulations guys!!

York surprises Waterpolo Gaels

by Bruce MacDougall

Queen's University Waterpolo Gaels drove away from Ottawa on Saturday with mixed feelings about their game. Instead of winning at least two of the three matches played that day, the team had to settle for a win against R.M.C. (9-2), a tie with York (7-7) and a loss against Carleton (11-6).

The surprise was York University. Tying the Yeomen was a bit of a shock. "We lost the game 7-7," said Marty Rosen, and indeed it seemed so. When it appeared that Brian "Speedy" Watson had scored the goal to win the game, York came back to tie with time almost out. Queen's had gone ahead with two goal efforts by Chuck Leighton and "Bozo" Watson but never moved out of reach.

Goalie Richard Glew tried to analyze the problem. "We seem to play at the level that the opposing team plays. Compared with the way we played Carleton, our games against R.M.C. and York were terrible. We have to learn to take our game to them."

It was a team effort against R.M.C., with eight players scoring. The play was not very exciting however. Jim Commerford explained that "R.M.C. just does not have the personnel to make a very strong team, and we treated the game mostly as a warm-up."

The match of the day was Carleton versus Queen's. Carleton, now with four national water polo members in its roster, set the pace and Queen's played hard beside them. Graeme Black was the game star, finding the net four times. Carleton got the initial jump, going ahead 4-2. Bruce MacDougall scored late in the second, to make it 4-3 at the half. When Carleton surged ahead 7-3, Queen's was again brought to within one goal, with John Williamson scoring late in the third. Carleton prevailed in the fourth quarter with four unanswered goals. "When you consider who we were up against", mused Dave Ardell, "you start to see that Queen's was playing extremely well."

The Gaels still maintain their second place division standing. "We have a couple of weeks off now", said Coach Simon Beidler. "We'll continue to work on our shooting. Carleton is afraid of us and knows that we can play the game with them." The team travels to Hamilton November 3, 4, and 5th for the McMaster challenge cup and return to OUAAC action November 11 at York.

Volleyball men victors again

by Dave Tod

On the weekend the Queen's men's Volleyball team travelled to St. Catharines for the Brock University Invitational Tournament. The Gaels once again showed that they deserve to be ranked as one of the top teams in the country, as Queen's placed first in a field of eight.

The team got off to a slow start on Saturday morning when they lost their only game of the tournament to McMaster. The Gaels bounced back though and swept the remaining two games and the match. Queen's was then pitted against their traditional rival U. of T. True to form, the Gaels humbled the Varsity Blues 15-13, 15-6. Brock, the host club, was also defeated 15-6, 15-3. In the finals Queen's confronted last year's OUAA champion, the Guelph Gryphons. Those who followed the team's activities last year will remember that Queen's was narrowly defeated by Guelph for the OUAA title. A week later Guelph went on to place third in the national championships. But history did not repeat itself this past weekend, as the Gaels won handily over the Gryphons 15-6, 15-1.

The Gaels played aggressively during the tournament, showing a combination of power, speed and sound blocking. The team looked sharp and there was no doubt that they were the class of the field.

Although the "regulars" Rodin, Bora, Skalski, Macdonnell, Glen Markham, Henk Meijer and Dave Morton all played well Brian "Breakfast" Macleod put on a dazzling display of spiking and blocking in the final game. Queen's also has two new promising rookies this year: Mike Cooper and John Soloninka.

Queen's shoots well

by Ken Davies

The Queen's Archery team competed last Friday Oct. 13 and Saturday Oct. 14 in the final two rounds of the OWIAA outdoor championship at UWO. This rounded up the first half of their season. The Gaels failed to improve upon their position from the preliminary round held in Guelph two weeks earlier, finishing fourth in the team competition. The squad representing U. of T. won the team title for the fifth consecutive year and its top archers, Julie Ford and Paddy Duncan, placing first and second respectively in the individual competition.

Queen's was led by Carolyn Grant who took first place in the B class on the virtue of a fine performance in the two final rounds. The other five girls who represented Queen's were Laurie Biddell, Chris Jenks, Patti Walker, Connie Grabstas and Elaine Connell.

For those of you who are not

familiar with the sport of Archery, each team member shoots from both 30 and 40 meters in outdoor competition. It takes four hours of intense concentration for each competitor to shoot one round (72 arrows) and the team scores are tallied from the four best individual scores.

Although the Queen's team is young and inexperienced, coach Keith Kiell is optimistic about his team's chances as the competitions move indoors for the remainder of the season. Kiell firmly believes that the Gaels can improve enough to place higher at the OWIAA indoor championships being held here at Queen's in February.

Prophet for our time

Shortly after being bestowed the mantle of minister of Consumer and Commercial Relations, Frank Drea, like some old Testament prophet, told the people of Ontario of his pronouncements on the immorality of topless waitresses. He has promised a crusade against bare bosoms in the bar rooms of our province, and to give the man his due, he must possess a moral perception lacking in the rest of us. How many others were aware of this problem, or its enormity?

Drea assumes his position of prophet honestly, for true to the Old Testament emphasis on the law he comes to his new portfolio from a year as minister of Correctional Services, where he was, as he described, "tough, hard and fair".

The new minister's plans extend beyond legislating waitress dress codes. He also wants to further restrict the availability of liquor licenses to restaurants and other establishments.

We risk being accused of irreverence, or even worse, disbelief, but we must ask exactly who Drea is speaking for in these statements? Is he expressing the unthought desire of the silent majority, or are these plans merely his personal conception of what public morality should be?

Drea is a flamboyant, outspoken personality and has given his new portfolio a prominent place in the public eye since the day of his appointment. Media visibility might translate into good politics for Premier Davis but it certainly is not synonymous with good government. Do we want a vocal and opinionated man to decide the proper moral standards for us, or more concisely, do we want anyone to do us this dubious favour?

In a Globe and Mail article of Thursday, October 19, the director of the Ontario Restaurant Association argued that the government should not be determining the number of liquor licenses issued in a free market situation. This seems a valid argument until we remember Drea is on a moral crusade; he is bent on saving us from ourselves.

The declaration of war on topless waitresses might seem of little consequences to many as it effects so few of us, yet it is still another example of the government's arm reaching into our private lives.

The new minister is on shaky ground if he contends he is protecting women, since the Ontario Council for the Status of Women, certainly more well informed on the issue of female oppression than he, has condemned his pronouncements, accusing him of "dumping on women".

An opposition to topless waitresses arising from a desire to put an end to sexual stereotyping the perception of women as objects is understandable. What is objectionable however, is a government crackdown that results from a simplistic appraisal of a complex situation.

Drea has made his blast with his eye toward the maintenance of public morality, but it is questionable how far his campaign will succeed in that direction. Women choose to work in such positions sometimes for the financial rewards but often because of economic necessity. It is doubtful that Drea gave much consideration to the fates of these "little people" in his proposals.

It is understandable why women have taken offense at the new minister's pronouncements. His crude front page statements demonstrate a lack of tact and an unenlightened attitude toward the human anatomy. He has attacked the whole issue with a vehemence one would expect to be reserved for the discussion of violent criminals.

The government already decides for us what we may watch at the movies as was demonstrated when the film Pretty Baby was banned from Ontario's theatres. Here we are given yet another instance of Big Brother informing the public of what is right and wrong, and making a distinction between what people want and what they should want.

Drea comes to us directly from his Correctional Services post and perhaps he is disoriented by the dizzying changes in politics. We can only hope that when his head stops spinning he will remember he is now dealing with Ontario's citizens and not its prisoners. We are autonomous and responsible people on the whole, well able to make our own decisions about what is morally right or wrong. This may be a little idealistic to assert, but we elected the government on the basis that it was a servant of the people.

Drea says he will try to use "moral persuasion" to convince topless waitresses to change their ways but he has let it be known that jail is a possibility for obstinate cases. If all this fails to alter social patterns to Drea's satisfaction, perhaps he will take to chucking thunderbolts or changing voyeuristic diners into pillars of salt.

Little student input in residences

by Doug Ronson

Compared to other universities in Ontario, students at Queen's play a small role in the administration of residences.

A Journal study has revealed that Waterloo, Carleton, Western and McGill (four of the five universities contacted) all exhibit substantially greater student input on the policy-setting residence advisory boards.

The residences Board advises the university on all residence matters, including fees and budgeting. At Queen's five of the nineteen members are students.

This contrasts with Waterloo, where the Residence Budget Committee is comprised solely of students. Carleton's residence policy board has five students and five administrators. There are ten students of the twenty-three members on Western's residences board, and McGill's board consists of four students and four administrators.

Queen's is the only university with alumni (five) on the advisory body.

Brian Copeland, former Inter-Residence Council Chairman at Queen's (now the LFRS), commented: "The Alumni have immense influence in terms of residence operations. The Alumni feels that they have the right to sit on residence boards because they have paid to build some of the residences. To be honest, the influence they have is out of proportion to the amount they've given."

Gerald McGrath, Director of Residences at Queen's, would not comment on Copeland's assertion. "That's one opinion," he said.

With respect to student participation in the administration of residences, McGrath had no qualms about the present arrangement

Copeland did though. He noted the dominance of alumni and administration on the Board, as well as the influence of McGrath himself.

"When I was IRC Chairman, you essentially had to go to McGrath and convince him your proposal was the best idea," he said.

McGrath denied that his role was as significant as Copeland implied.

Compared to other universities, in the province, Queen's students have little input into their residences. Ironically, residence fees here are unusually high.

ASUS vote:
no change

by Julia Grunau

A recount of the votes cast in last Thursday's ASUS by-elections yielded one more vote apiece for Hima Mathew and Carol Buckley but failed to change the overall standings of the three candidates.

The final results of the election leave Sandy Bair with 214, Hima Mathew with 198, and Carol Buckley with 195. Bair and Mathew are now able to hold seats on Outer Council meetings.

Buckley submitted the request for a recount after the preliminary results showed she was only 3 votes behind Mathew, when polls closed Thursday.

Management still hopeful

Elrond debt $4 million

by Rob Southcott

If you ignore the fact that Elrond College Inc. is currently owing mortgages that total $4 million, you could probably say that they're off to a fairly good start this year.

Elrond, the massive student residence that stands at the corner of Princess and Division St has a $3 million first mortgage with the Canadian Mortgage and Housing Corporation, a $1 million mortgage with Queen's, and a $30,000 loan from the A.M.S., but despite all this, it looks like Elrond will carry on.

John Clement, the newly-appointed manager of Elrond, is confident about both the financial state of Elrond and its actual cooperative functioning.

"I think the people here have a pretty good interest in the place," said Clement of Elrond's cooperative structure, which includes students in the maintenance of the building, but Clement admitted that Elrond has had to cut down on "frills" because "we're in a time of restraint like anyone else".

One of the main concerns that Elrond faces is keeping up its cash flow, especially during the months during the spring and summer. This is because the tenants of Elrond pay their instalments in August, October and February, thus leaving the cash to run out, as it did last summer, when Elrond defaulted on their mortgage with the C.M.H.C. Technically, the C.M.H.C. could foreclose on Elrond's mortgage, either selling the building, leaving it empty, or renovating it for apartments - something which could prove difficult and expensive. Elrond is constructed in 12, 8, and 4 man "houses", with elevators that only stop at every third floor. Clement doubts though, that the C.M.H.C. would foreclose "if they see some sort of improvement in the cash

Input into residences

"I'm a man with more than one master. I'm responsible to the residences Board and Vice-Principal Love for my actions", he said.

At Queen's the Residences Board can only advise the university on fees and budgeting. The Vice-Principal actually administers financial matters. The Board is responsible for admissions policy, and appoints and directs the Dons and Wardens. It consists of five students (26%), five alumni, five faculty members, and four ex-officio members.

Western's board operates similarly, except that, this year, ten of the twenty-three members are students (43%). The University has the final say but hasn't had to overrule the board in ten years, according to Mr. Knill, the Director of Housing.

McGill, included in this Ontario survey because of its size and importance, has an eight member Residence Council which consists of half students and half faculty. McGill is unique because the Director of Residence lives in residence. Therefore, he must be aware of the problems the students are facing. The council can only make recommendations to the university. In fact, last year the university reversed a board decision to close a dining hall as an economy measure.

At Carleton, five students and five administrators sit on the residences board. They have full power to establish fees and budget expenditures. They may also make changes in services and the meal plan.

At Waterloo, the administration establishes the budget constraints and proposes fees to the student residence council (which consists entirely of students). The students then rework the budget and submit their proposals. The Vice-President of Finance makes the final budgetary decisions.

The University of Toronto is the only university which has less student participation in residence administration than Queen's. They do not have a residence board and the Administration is totally responsible for financial matters. Each residence has a Student Council which can pressure the Dean of Men (Warden) for changes.

flow." John Koopman, AMS vice-president and former member of Elrond's board of directors, does not see things quite the same way. Pointing to a recent audit of Elrond's finances, Koopman says that there's "absolutely no way that Elrond will run and cover its costs", and he believes that "there's a chance that Elrond will run out of cash sometime next year." Koopman stated that he'd be "very surprised to see Queen's or the C.M.H.C. get the principal back on their loans," believing that Queen's would rather accept the loss and that the AMS "isn't likely to see any of their money," either.

One reason behind Elrond's problems seems to be the trend towards more students living in old, single family houses around the campus area. Clement was critical of developers who have bought up such units and rented them out to students, but he mentioned that proposed new city bylaws are going to make this practice less profitable in the future.

However, Clement was not optimistic about the occupancy level of Elrond rising (it now stands at about 90%). He made this estimate in view of the trend of people moving to high rise apartments in the downtown area (there are currently two new buildings being proposed for the waterfront area). Clement stated that the vacancy rate in downtown single dwellings is going to rise, thus causing the tight student housing situation to "loosen up". Instead of getting worse as many have predicted.

On the whole, Clement remains optimistic about Elrond, stating that it had provided "a good educational experience" for its occupancy occupants, has kept down rents for student who are living off campus, and generally, provided an alternative for students who don't want to live in residence or the "student ghetto".

Environment and industry can co-exist says Berger

by Jo-Anne Stead

The depth of our commitment to environmental values when they stand in the way of technological and industrial advance is the key issue in Canada's future, according to Mr. Justice Thomas Berger.

The commissioner of the MacKenzie Valley Pipeline Commission spoke on the results, effects, and implications, of the report during his lecture Monday night in Dunning Auditorium.

While compiling the report Berger was informed that "The Arctic gas pipeline project would be the greatest project, in terms of capital expenditure, ever undertaken by private enterprise anywhere".

The inquiry lasted two and one half years, and in Yellowknife alone, heard from 300 expert witnesses and 1,000 northerners.

The report came to the conclusion that "the Alaskan Highway route, as a corridor for the transportation of Alaskan gas to the lower 48 states was preferable from an environmental point of view". The Government of Canada has since decided that the pipeline should be built along the same route recommended in the report.

Berger recalled some of the other outcomes of the report, "The proposals made for the creation of an international wilderness part in Alaska and the Yukon, for a whale sanctuary in MacKenzie Bay, and for bird sanctuaries in the MacKenzie Delta and MacKenzie Valley have attracted widespread support in Canada and the United States".

The need for more energy, the reason behind the inquiry, was an important concern of Berger's. "North America now uses about five times as much energy as is consumed in the whole of Asia", he stated in illustrating "Our belief in an everexpanding cycle of growth and consumption."

"To what extent our national objectives are determined by the need for the care and feeding of the industrial machine" is the important question that Berger thinks Canada is now facing. "The future of the world we know and of our environment" is depending on the answer, stated Berger. Justice Berger was interviewed after his speech by Journal reporter JoAnne Stead.

Q: You've requested that all levels of government help develop the renewable resource potential of the north and to allow for a diversification of job opportunities for Northern people. What type of jobs did you have in mind, when you made this statement concerning renewable opportunities?

traditional economy, is still important to us; many people are employed in the traditional economy. They said that we believe that more people can be employed in the traditional economy, that it should be encouraged that the harvesting of renewable resources in Northern Canada are on a perpetual yield basis, can offer continuing and secure employment to many, many northern people. They pointed out that we haven't even inventoried the fisheries resources of the MacKenzie River. They pointed out that there are stands of merchantable timber along the MacKenzie River that local sawmilling and lumbering operations could be established some already exist and encouraged they can provide the materials to rebuild native villages instead of prefabricated houses being imported from Edmonton and Winnipeg. They said that they should be employed in managing the wilderness areas, the game sanctuaries, that I proposed, so that employment in the north isn't just oil and gas. It encompasses renewable resources as well as non-renewable resources. The focus of the government in the past has been on the northern renewable resource sector. We should not overlook the potential of the renewable resource sector, anyways, there is greater potential in terms of local employment. That may not produce millions of dollars in revenue for the

Dean's Table short on students, but profs keen

by Liz McClung

Low turnout for the lunchtime "Dean's Table" meetings between professors and students in the McLaughlin Room has disappointed AMS organizers.

"There has been tremendous response from the profs, but the requests from the students are just trickling in," said Pam Lambert, director of the program. Lambert stated that on the average, she has only been able to fill one table a week, with two profs, and three students.

Lambert continued, "So far, there have been very few problems with the lunches, and those who have participated have really enjoyed themselves." She feels that one of the points in favour of the "Dean's Table" is its flexibility: the student may request a specific prof, or faculty, if the scheduled days are inconvenient, she will try to arrange another day, and if an entire class wants to lunch with their prof, she will try to arrange it.

"All someone has to do is suggest something, and I will do my best to set it up," she added.

Forms to set up a lunch are available at the AMS office, and at the Info-Bank. All the student has to do is fill out a form, give Pam about one week's notice, and she will set up the entire lunch.

A cold spirit in the air as ghost haunts Journal

by Deb MacLeod

We're all inclined to snicker with incredulity when someone mentions ghosts, but Alfie Pierce's ghost is "alive" and well and living in the Student Union, more noteworthy, the Journal offices. The ghost is a well-known fact among older alumni, and there have been reports by reputable witnesses.

Alfie Pierce was the son of a runaway slave, born in Kingston in 1874. One story has it that at the age of 15, while playing at a school where Ban Righ now stands, Alfie was approached by one of Queen's famed athletes and asked over to one of the playing fields. It was the beginning of Alfie's career as mascot, masseur and equipment manager for the football team in 1891.

Alfie began a long tradition for the Gaels. He would greet each player as the team ran onto the field, dressed in Queen's colours: a yellow waistcoat with red button, red pants, a blue tunic with yellow cuffs, plus a Fort Henry military cap or "shoko".

After throwing a football to the captain, a cheering ritual would begin at the student bleachers. Cheerleaders would shout, "What's the matter with Alfie?" The fans yelled back, "He's all right!" "Who's all right?" "Alfie!" "Who says so?" "Everybody!" "Who's everybody?"

Oil thighs would then abound from the bleachers and the game would begin.

By 1931, with the onset of age, Alfie was getting too old to follow the team around. He died in February, 1951, ending a long tradition at Queen's. There is a plaque dedicated to his memory in the lobby of the main entrance to the gym.

Alfie's ghost was first seen over a decade ago in the Journal office. That eerie press night, the editor, left all alone to add the final touches to the paper, felt a sudden, cold chill in the air and upon turning around found himself face to face with Alfie's cloudy image. Even now in the wee hours of the morning on a long press night, strange noises and unusual occurrences take place as Alfie's ghost haunts the Journal office.

The noted and respectable Journal spiritualist, Heeliva Inthera has expressed deep concern over the possibility of a spirit casting a curse on the Journal.

It is not a rare event for a ghost to cause ill-luck on a person or group," he said.

This would easily explain the errors which have plagued the Journal so far this year.

A menacing apparition wanders the Journal office

Student input vital

by Warren Everson

The AMS has again called for student input into the ongoing court review. Internal Affairs Commissioner Richard Binhammer, under whose commission the committee is operating, hopes that students will submit written or oral submissions to him before Nov. 1, when an open forum will be held to discuss the future of the court.

"The Court Review will probably not be finished before January or February, but we hope to get opinions from the whole of the campus community early on so we can include them in our discussion," said Binhammer.

The court review was initiated following widespread criticism of the organization that built up over the last two or three years, according to committee members. Last year's "Lapins case", and the large number of decisions overturned by the Senate Appeals board, gave added evidence to the problems of the court.

The AMS executive considers the review to be an extremely high priority. "It's one of the most important things we'll do this year," said president Dave Brown.

"What we'd like are written submissions, or else just information that someone will be making an oral presentation at the open meeting," said Binhammer. So far we haven't had too much input, and we really feel that its vital to the review. Obviously, unless the court is respected, it will be worthless. It depends on the students to make it work."

A I have a job, I'm a judge in Vancouver, like everyone else I go to work in the morning and I come home at night and that's what I'm paid for. From time to time when I have some time off I accept a speaking engagement and then I may go away for a day or two. That's only because there is such great interest still in the work of the inquiry and I'm not often able to accept speaking invitations. When I'm able to, I'm happy to do so. I have a great interest in all of the issues, naturally, but it is for others to pursue them. I'm steadily employed. Judges are appointed to conduct Royal Commissions from time to time. I've conducted one for the government of B.C., I've conducted one for the government of Canada. I think that is enough for now.

New Anglican Chaplain will create "a spiritual critique"

by Sean Dewart

Dick DeShaw, the new Anglican Chaplain, hopes to set a new tone to that position. Although his recent appointment is an interim one while the Anglican Diocese examines the role of Chaplain at Queen's, DeShaw has clearly established his goals.

He does not want merely to establish an Anglican forum at the University, but rather to open a dialogue whereby all the students might examine themselves in the light of the institutions and functions of daily life. He sees these as potentially destructive to the spirit of men and feels that they should not pass by unexamined.

"I don't have the right answers as much as I hope I have the right questions. If someone wanted counselling, I might well send them to the Counselling Service." His role, he said, was really a "philosophical one". But he emphasised that "I am not here to initiate a social critique as much as a spiritual (small 's') one."

He has started a series of lunchtime discussions that deal with such issues as "University Culture or Technique?" on Fridays at noon in the Grey House.

DeShaw is also involved in a program run by convicts at the penitentiary called "Operation Springboard", that works with the families of the men in prison.

Deutsch Centre gradually reaching potential

Offices finally taken

Six groups move in

by Shelly Matson

Six new organizations will be moving into previously unfilled office space in the John Deutsch University Centre, according to John Koopman, AMS Vice-president (Operations).

The AMS has been concerned about the vacant office space in the Centre since last year; they had expected that organizations would come forward on their own for space. This lack of interest prompted an advertisement in the Journal two weeks ago, which generated some response.

"We anticipated sixty to seventy applicants to our advertisement in the Journal, but we only received about thirty," Koopman said.

Queen's Bands, Camp Outlook and the Queen's Musical Theatre are all now in residence at the University Centre. The Graduate Students' Society, which was previously without an official office, has taken over the old Women's Centre facilities on the third floor.

ASUS and the Lictor are taking joint quarters also. Koopman said, "We accepted ASUS with the stipulation that they use the Centre as their head office."

Four offices which were formerly the home of the AMS will be used by clubs in a joint arrangement. "They don't really need full-time office space," noted Koopman. "They can share filing space and book the offices for the evening if they like."

Four other offices still remain vacant however. "One of these will not be ready for three months because of construction," Koopman said. "Another will probably be used by the AMS for storage."

Staff

The Board of Directors of the AMS has requested the first review in three years of AMS and Service finances.

The report is being prepared by Sheila Murray and John Koopman, and one of its main functions will be to assess the recent pub profits, concentrating on the profit goal and its distribution. The Board hopes that with a review in hand, they will be better able to set future policies.

The pub has made an average profit of $5,000 per annum in the past, and the Board's future price policies will relate directly to that figure.

The Board of Directors will receive the report on October 30. Outer Council will examine it on November 1 and give their recommendations concerning the report at the following Board meeting.

Financial review for AMS

THE BIG LIE!

BY
DAVID

Ban on frats secure

by Janet Brick

The recent debate over the proposed Commerce faculty house, and the popularity of the movie "Animal House", have evoked memories of the years when fraternity houses were an integral part of university life on most campuses. Queen's, however, was one of the exceptions, because of a 1930's Senate resolution banning any "externally affiliated" fraternities or sororities.

In 1934, this resolution was tested by a group of medical students, who formed the Delta Omega Kappa fraternity house. The A.M.S. executive responded by disallowing any Greek-letter organizations, and the med students eventually abandoned the scheme to a group of imaginative Artsies, who shortened the name to "the D.O.K. Club".

After their unsuccessful attempt to form their own 'frat' house, the meds, and six members of the Golden Gaels football team, joined the internationally recognized Beta Sigma chapter of the Nu Sigma Nu, and opened the Psi Delta Phi fraternity house, in direct defiance of the Senate resolution. The immediate consequence was trial by the A.M.S. executive, who, finding the students guilty, suspended all their student, social, political and athletic privileges. This hit the football team the hardest, forcing it to finish the season with only the remaining "Fearless 14" players.

The long term result has been a total absence of 'frat houses' and a recent Outer Council debate on the Commerce faculty house made it clear that fraternities are still not acceptable at Queen's because of the fragmentation of school spirit that they cause.

The Family of Love spreads God's word

Kim Fennell

Two members of the religious group, the Family of Love, were on campus Tuesday and Wednesday to "spread the message of God". Stationed in front of the library, they were busy passing out literature and collecting donations.

The pamphlet that students were given was entitled, The Big Lie, an illustrated story of how Darwin's theory of evolution was concocted to "eliminate faith in God". The literature discredited scientists with such lines as, "You kids probably wonder how we scientists can make up such things from so little evidence...It's simple! When you are as smart as we are you don't need any evidence, just a damn good imagination!"

Brian Allen, one of the "family", said he and his associate had hitchhiked up from Montreal. He claims the group has been in existence for ten years and operates in 70 to 80 countries with a total membership of 7000. The founder of the movement is known as Moses David, their prophet, who started the group with his wife and four kids in California.

Allen said that donations were collected to help in their work. He explained that it was used to help provide clothes and housing for the members and to publish their literature. The rest is given away to worthy causes. Allen claimed they were "penny-pinchers" and needed very little to live on.

The Family of Love, (formerly known as the "Children of God") also have some beliefs in socialism. They denounce the present communist regimes in places like the Soviet Union, but claim that it is inevitable that the whole world will have socialist governments. Allen explained that the Western civilization will fall because of man's greed, but that Jesus will return to show us the way.

Allen admitted that they did not have permission to be passing out literature or collecting donations on campus. He said if they took the trouble to get authorization they might be rejected.

When contacted, Vice-President Courtwright said he did not know of any university regulations which prohibited such activity. He pointed out, however, that this was a relatively uncommon occurrence at Queen's.

Allen said the organization's central home is in Italy but it does not have a street address, explaining that "it would be crazy to do that because they'd be too vulnerable". The organization operates behind the iron curtain where religious freedom is not allowed, and therefore it is dangerous at times for them to be out in the open. The Montreal group has a post office box number for an address (Box 799 Station A).

Drama majors focus of abusive stereotype

by Megan Smith

While working this summer I was often asked where I went to school during the year. "Queen's University" I would reply. People were always impressed. "And what are you studying?" was their next question. "Drama." Suddenly their faces would cloud over as if I had mouthed a socially unacceptable word or committed some obscene act. Invariably they would recoil, having quickly assessed that I was "one of those people." They would feign a cheery "Oh how nice!" or "What fun!" incapable of masking their contempt and distrust of "drama types."

CAULFIELD FLEMING

Defence of Maggie T.

Somewhere in the South of France a beautiful young mother of three is silently weeping. Her precious tears are dropping like flies all over the editorial page of the Toronto Globe and Mail.

The cause of those tiny tears is you, O Moralistic Reader, for you have written yet another mean letter to the editor. The headline screams "Maggie T. a bigger disgrace than Argos, says Irate Citizen".

Citizen, cane not the metaphorical bum of this gentle soul! The fault lies, not with this blooming flower child, but in the hardening alleyways of your rigid, judgemental minds. My fellow Canadians, you are boring, lustreless, snivelly-nosed snipes! You are galumphy frumps, dumping clumps of envious dung on the most elegant lump of womanhood that this (Our Home and Native) land has ever produced!

What is this worm in our national psyche which causes us to so vehemently revile Margaret Trudeau? I know of at least 3 theories.

Theory #1: The National Abhorrence of Pizzazz. Maggie has pizzazz. Canadians view anyone with pizzazz as roughly the equal of a man carrying a purse. Although pizzazz is not contagious, I know of at least one very respectable Rosedale matron who lysols her humble hovel immediately after a pizzazz-poseur exits. Pizzazz is not Italian, although a number of that otherwise respectable group have tendencies in that direction.

When I first encountered this enmity, I attempted to justify myself by quickly adding that I had taken a variety of other courses including English, History and Politics. As the summer progressed, I became increasingly reluctant to confess my horrible secret - that I was a Drama Major. Puzzled by my uncharacteristic reaction, I examined the possible motivations that would elicit such a response.

I came to the unpleasant realization that I had become the victim of a stereotype. Due to my concentration in drama, certain negative and unfounded assumptions had been made about my character,

This is a slushy-grey country. We have no time for cute butts. Ours are all frozen.

Theory #2: The Beauty of Duty. Canada has always been victimized by rampant Calvinism. This has led to periodic holy-rolling hemorrhaging, some examples being Prohibition, Mackenzie (Hi Ma!) King and Frank Drea.

This Calvinism is also reflected in our conception of duty. Canadians strongly believe that once you've made your bed, you must lie therein. Even when the population of said bed has a tendency to increase every Christmas.

Theory #3: Plain Old Jealousy. Humans have been jealous of one another ever since the invention of Marxism. It is a basic human emotion, although not considered a very nice one. And in these days of Diving Dollars it would take a Saint not to be a little envious of anyone with enough spondulix that she could gambol around sunny foreign climes.

And so, Dear Reader, you sit in your drab, cold room, penning poisonous letters which will appear in every editorial page in the country. You see a young and joyous songbird flying with the famous and your only wish is for the start of hunting season. How drab you are!

Somewhere in the South of France a beautiful young mother of 3 is silently weeping...
Only the good cry young i.e. I was shallow, unstable, a phony. In social situations I found myself at a distinct disadvantage. I had been forced into a position where it became necessary to prove myself worthy of people's respect or thereafter be considered a frivolous person incapable of serious thought. I discovered that many of my colleagues had been subjected to similar abuse. Surprisingly, the most hostile reaction came from within the university community itself. For instance, men were categorized as 'faggy', women considered 'loose', all of us viewed as irresponsible n'er do wells. I am appalled at this lack of sensitivity and ignorance. Furthermore, there is no excuse for these misconceptions and derogatory

The legislation of social morals

The Editor:

The involvement of government in issues of morality is a difficult subject to address. Certainly men cannot be made good by legislation, but we all agree that some legislation is necessary. The question is - What is good legislation? and more specifically with regard to Mr. Drea - How should entertainment in public places be ordered?

There are three sets of rights directly involved in the 'topless waitress' issue. They are those of the patrons, the waitresses, and the bar owners. The legislation is designed to reduce sexual stereotyping. It is also meant to prevent the economic manipulation of women. Do the patrons' or the bar owners' rights supersede those of the waitresses? If they do then something is wrong with the system.
Bill Moore

attitudes to persist

The majority of the courses offered in the drama department are academically oriented and require not only an analytical mind and a well-developed intelligence, but a cultivated creative and imaginative ability. The practical aspect of the degree program is designed to provide a working knowledge of acting and production techniques. As a lab experiment demonstrates the practical aspects of a scientific discipline, so the studio courses are a necessary tool for a fuller understanding of the dramatic discipline.

Moreover, any involvement in stage productions is considered extra-curricular. It takes a dedicated and responsible individual to add a six week rehearsal period (involving close to thirty hours a week in rehearsals alone) to an already heavy class schedule. That adds up to roughly seventy hours a week, which I might add is a moderate estimate.

I do not mean to suggest that those of us studying drama work harder than students in other faculties, however, I would like to make it quite clear that we too, are serious students committed to the pursuit of a greater knowledge in our chosen field.

AMS vice-president Koopman mourns the loss of student ideals and activism

A eulogy for student movement

Although today's ideals seem like nothing more than a relic from days gone by, there was a time when the student movement pursued such things. Who can forget the student protests against the war in Vietnam in the late sixties? Kent State stands out as a particularly poignant episode where several students actually lost their lives protesting a barbaric war. Unfortunately such altruism seems lost on the contemporary student.

Yesterday's student movement protested against decaying inner cities and a social system that all but condemned those born in such environments to a life of poverty and crime.

Today's student lobby diligently battles a potential rise in the price of tuition which would only mean that the children of the wealthy would have to pay a hundred dollars more.

Yesterday's student movement saw the likes of Tom Hayden and the Students for a Democratic Society fight for what they perceived to be a better system for all.

Today's student lobby has all but ignored the forgotten and underprivileged members of our society, and instead debates the relative merits of counter-cyclical funding for post-secondary education.

When I was younger I looked forward to one day participating in a vigorous idealistic student movement that strove only to help create a better society for all. My brief encounter with the Ontario Students movement has left me sadly disillusioned.

The Ontario Federation of Students has degenerated to nothing more than a lobby in Queen's Park for what the O.F.S. perceives to be the student interest across the province. Student interests are no longer perceived to be the attainment of the 'just society' but rather, the working of the best deal possible for an already generally affluent student body.

Surely we as students can afford to eschew the interest group game that causes self-seeking interests in business and labour to send hoards of professional lobbyists to Queen's Park and Ottawa. Why has the student movement allowed itself to decay to the point where it resorts to the petty pandering of politicians for purely selfish reasons?

We as students have a mandate to expose the powerful special interests for what they truly are. Instead, through the Ontario Federation of Students we have merely become another interest group.

Our mandate as students is to call for changes in the social system that will result in a more egalitarian state for all. The war in Vietnam is over but there are many more battles yet to be fought before we lay our heads to rest.

Even as you read this column war rages in Ethiopia as an autocratic regime fights to prevent the liberation of Eritrea. Millions continue to starve in Biafra and Bangladesh as our student union complains about Saga. We debate the sexist slant of Norman Mailer and turn our backs on the plight of the untouchables in India.

There are battles yet to be fought!

Have the seventies taken away the veil of innocence through which students used to see the world? Chuck Edwards - where are you today?

"Battered Wives" defence

The Editor,

In response to the article in Tuesday's Journal about the NUS's stand in regard to the band "Battered Wives", I would like to offer a few comments.

Most importantly it should be made clear that in no instance does the band promote, or even mention violence towards women in any of the songs on the album. If you sit and listen to the record (something I wonder if the people mentioned in the article did), you find that the band has a very good sense of humour, a very dry wit, a bit of social commentary, and one song that, depending on your point of view, could be considered either funny or obscene.

The major criticism is about their band name, "Battered Wives" which is taken as being very objectionable. I think that a close look at the album cover would be in order. On the front cover is a chauffeured limousine, (the owner of which is a very shapely young woman), that has stopped to pick up the members of the band. On the back cover the scene is some time later, in a dark alley. The chauffeur is opening the door of the limousine for the same girl from the previous scene, while strewn about the alley like discarded refuse are the members of the band who look, "used & abused", as the saying goes.

These scenes presented under the title, "Battered Wives", would seem to lend credence to the statement made by the band's manager, Dave Hughes, about the bands not having been accepted by either the punk or straight rockers.

If a stand on these grounds must be taken perhaps it should, for example, be against a band like the "Dead Boys" who have a song called, "I Need Lunch", in which their lead vocalist, Stiv Bators, sings, "...don't look at me that way girl or your face is gonna get a punch...". This is a band that could be more readily accused of the charges that have unjustly been levelled at the "Battered Wives".

It seems to me that the people who levelled these complaints at the band did not look beyond their name to try and find out what they really have to say in the words and music on the record itself. That reeks of closed-mindedness, which has always been my definition of being old, (rather than calendar age). It's also the basis of my interpretation of the following excerpt from Peter Townshend's classic rock 'n' roll song, "My Generation", "...I hope I die before I get old."

Back to work order a power play jeopardizing collective bargaining

Otto Lang and the Trudeau government have come close to creating a very nasty and almost violent situation with the Canadian Union of Postal Workers (CUPW). Their heavy-handed tactics have nearly forced the moderate Canadian labor movement to become militant.

When the government passed back-to-work legislation last Wednesday, almost immediately after CUPW went out on strike, they were forcing union president Jean-Claude Parrot to adopt a radical stance. As soon as the deal went down the issue was no longer the wages of the Posties, but the entire collective bargaining system and the right to strike. What union could come out against collective bargaining and the right to strike? It is difficult to know who was more frightened, Parrot who had to advocate that his members ignore the highest law-making body in the land, or the Trudeau government, who had precipitated a disregard for the rule of law along class lines.

Moreover, government members presented somewhat less than a consensual view on the issue. While Lang was talking fines and arrests and Lamontagne was talking about firings, Labor Minister Andre Ouellette was appointing a mediator - arbitrator, thus legitimizing the union's position.

A rather large blow to the government's stance came when Toronto Police Chief Harold Adamson said that his men would not remove picketers, as that would result in "a breach of the peace." The statement by Chief Adamson represented his reluctance to get involved in situation akin to that of Oshawa in the 1930's. This apprehension of the police to become involved in the fray did not bode well for the government.

As this is being written, the RCMP have moved and have obtained documents and files from several union headquarters. There have also been warrants issued for Parrot and other union leaders. These events come as the union was facing the midnight back-to-work deadline established by Postmaster-General Lamontagne. Indeed, the union executive might have well advocated that its members return to work in the face of rising factionalization in CUPW. If anything these latest moves will strengthen the resolve of the members thus forcing CUPW to once again take a radical stance. Otto, you've done it again.

From the beginning the Canadian Labor Congress (CLC) has given only tacit support to the Posties. Such was the conciliatory nature of the body that this Wednesday, they were to announce an alternative to the government position to get the Posties back to work. However, after the latest moves by the government and the RCMP they have delayed the announcement. Therefore, in essence, Otto Lang has created an awareness and cohesion among workers in Canada that the CLC were unable to do in the 1976 National Day of Protest.

In contrast to the Posties back to work legislation is that enacted for the Marine Engineers. The government intervened to get the Great Lakes ships back, moving came after ten days of strike action in an extremely vital area. Indeed, the multi-faceted (faced?) Lang stated the government held off until the last possible moment in hopes a settlement could be reached.

It appears that the government is using CUPW in particular, and public service unions in general, as a scapegoat for the economic woes of the country. By taking a hard line, the Trudeau regime may be trying to appease the right wing factions in the country. Unfortunately, this political power play seriously endangers the rights of the public servants for collective bargaining and the hard fought right to strike.

Despite Mr. Trudeau's call for entrenched constitutional rights it would appear, in a very Orwellian sense, that some rights are more equal than others.

Candy bars vs charity

by Karen McNeil

On the way to the Tuck Shoppe on Wednesday, where I intended to stuff my face with chocolate bars as a compensation for missing lunch, I was hailed by a pleasant young man, who handed me a pamphlet entitled, "The Big Lie". He was very polite and soft-spoken, said that he was handing out pamphlets for donations and that "we work with children". I just as politely handed it back and said that I wasn't interested.

Unfortunately, as I waded on, I felt guilty. Guilty because I was willing to spend 54 cents on totally unnecessary junk food, but wouldn't donate anything. Guilty because the person who was handing out information would probably have to stand on the same street corner, being rebuffed, for a number of hours. Guilty because, after all, someone who works with kids can't be all bad.

Luckily, by the time I reached the John Deutsch Centre, I had regained my senses and realized that the only thing I had to be guilty about was the fact that I had made the decision not to donate anything without first reading the literature.

A feeling of charity needn't swamp common sense. No matter what the cues, ("we work with children", "religious organization", clean-cut, well-groomed, pleasant workers, etc.), it's a waste of money to make a donation to a cause which seems to have no definite base, and which cannot show where one's money is going, as is the case with most of the organizations that deal from street corners. Moreover, if the cause is legitimate, then there are other avenues for raising money open to its supporters.

As of today, my days of "guilt giving" are over.

Soviets plotting in the Southern hemisphere

by Paul D. Tinari

It is indeed interesting to note that while a great deal of time and expense has been spent to protect Western interests in the Indian Ocean, very little has been done to keep a watch on the sea-lanes of the south Atlantic. In the years to come, the most important area in the whole world will be accessible by passing through the South Atlantic. Russian activity in the South Atlantic and Antarctic waters had become so intense by the mid-1970's that several South American countries were forced to declare 200 mile territorial limits to keep Russian ships out. Already thousands of Cubans and Eastern Germans are fighting in the many localized wars which are a regular occurrence in South America, and several nuclear subs have been observed in Antarctic waters.

The overall plan of the Warsaw Pact countries is now becoming very clear. First, get control of a large number of strong points all along the East coast of Africa to gain control of the vital Persian Gulf. Second, aid the overthrow of Rhodesia and South Africa, not for human rights reasons, but to secure control of the huge mineral wealth of the area. And third, establish naval bases in Antarctica to gain control of sea lanes in the South Atlantic. When these three aims are realized, the West will suddenly find herself at the complete mercy of the Eastern Block countries at any time they may desire it.

It seems obvious that the Russian government has never forgotten the fact that American and British troops invaded their country during the first World War in a bid to overthrow the newly established Communist regime. Their country suffered so much during the last war that they are prepared to go to any lengths to ensure beyond a shadow of a doubt that they shall never be attacked in a position of weakness again.

With a firm grip on the raw materials supplying Western industry, the Warsaw pact knows that in a war, Nato could not hold out for long. Even more significantly, control of natural resources can be a major item in controlling the policies of peace time. It is certain that many new developments of significant importance to the Western world will be taking place in the South Atlantic in the very near future.

Flouridation an issue

The Editor:

The November 13 municipal referendum regarding fluoridation of the Kingston water supply provides an excellent opportunity for the student population at Queen's to make a positive contribution to the future health of this city. Previous fluoridation referenda have been defeated here, most recently in 1972.

The addition of substances to the water that is consumed by an entire community can be argued to be an infringement of civil rights. This point of view pales, however, in the light of long term studies of the results of fluoridation, which show that the incidence of tooth decay in younger age groups (14-16 years) is reduced by 60-70%.

Fluoride's protective effect is most important during infancy and early childhood (the major periods of tooth development), so a vote for fluoridation is in a sense a charitable act for local children. Cavity-preventing activity continues into adulthood, and there is evidence that fluoride plays a role in the maintenance of bone structure in older people, it can be seen that everyone benefits.

The proposed program would supplement natural fluoride levels in the water, raising its concentration to one (1) part per million. This is a non-toxic level that is standard in similar programs across North America.

There is an active pro-fluoridation group in the city, organized by the Public Health Unit and local dentists. Their "FLUORIDE SAVES" posters are increasingly in evidence around town. A motion is before the A.M.S. Outer Council at this time, proposing that it support fluoridation. This motion has the unanimous support of the Queen's University Aesculapian Society Executive.

Previous defeats indicate that this decision may be a close one, and every supporting vote is needed. The beneficiaries would be all citizens of Kingston, and this includes most of the students at Queen's.

Sincerely,
Niels Giddins
Aesculapian Society Representative

The Difference...

We at Dimension Stereo pre-select the best values in stereo equipment and then put together well balanced combinations for maximum system performance. Our $685 system is a good example.

The speaker system is so important that we have selected the new Advent 1. It uses the same woofer and tweeter as the famous large Advent but in a smaller enclosure. It sounds very similar but bass output at ultra-low frequencies is slightly less. Its great sound has made it a best seller over night.

The receiver is a remarkable achievement by SONY. The model STR-12 produces 25 watts per channel at a price where others produce 15. We feel that this is the outstanding buy of the season.

We have added the popular TAYA CP250 auto-shut-off turntable for its high performance, attractive appearance and moderate cost.

At only $685, this system provides a big room-filling sound that is warm and clear.

In addition, our approach to customer support is unique. Our staff are trained in both technical and sales areas - our service people are sales people. Our $25,000 test lab is used to check and adjust every unit sold so that it works better when it leaves our store. # ROCKY HORROR IN SANITY

by Mark McGotti

Two years ago it might have been a severe shock to the system of the average inhabitant of Ottawa to wander by the Towne Cinema at 11:30 p.m. on a Friday night. Had he done so, he would have been confronted by an extremely long, completely unruly line of people waiting to see the midnight movie.

This in itself is not truly extraordinary. But, for God's sake, these people are simply not ordinary. Well over half of them are dressed in various costumes so ridiculously outlandish, so indescribably weird, that they would seem far more at home on a distant planet.

The whole scene - from the large compressed mass of people threatening to literally burst through the doors at the front, to the last stragglers filling up the parking lot of the greasy spoon around the corner from the theatre - looks like the product of some crazed surrealist artist's brain, transferred to reality.

Add to this a pungent, and definitely illegal odour, emanating from the strange looking cigarettes smoked by many of the participants, and you have a scenario absolutely guaranteed to send any law-abiding citizen straight to the authorities.

Today, however, the scene wouldn't faze even the most reactionary Ottawa native. He would understand that it was just the Rocky Horror crowd gearing up for another evening of their favourite entertainment.

Three years ago, the Rocky Horror Picture Show was a name known only

And Crawling on the Planet's face
Some insects called the human race
Lost in time
And lost in space
And meaning.

to a small coterie of dedicated decadence lovers. Now the situation is drastically different.

The film has played at Queen's 5 times in the last 10 months. In Ottawa, it started playing at the Towne at midnight, one Friday per month - it now plays every Friday and Saturday night, and still sells out every show. In New York, there have been two "Rocky Horror Show" conventions, featuring masquerades, live appearances by the film's stars, and of course, the show itself. Needless to say, both of these were packed.

The list goes on and on. The Waverly, in Greenwich Village, plays it every midnight, rare is the weekend night in Toronto when you can't see it at either the New Yorker or the Roxy, the Seville plays it in Montreal, where it attracts quite a large Francophone crowd; and this summer it played at two theatres in all places, Calgary.

And what of this "Rocky Horror Picture Show"? - what of this movie which inspires such unbelievable levels of fanaticism? (to qualify as a hard core fan, one must have seen the movie at least 10 times; the most viewings this author has ever heard of is 126, by a projectionist in Philadelphia) - what indeed?

The Rocky Horror Show was the brainchild of a lanky, thin faced gentleman named Richard O'Brien. It started life at a west end theatre in London, in 1974, where it is still playing. O'Brien wrote the music and lyrics and co-wrote the script with Jim Sharman.

As a play, it was a light-hearted spoof cum theatre of the absurd. Bizarre characters in white face plexiglass masks circulated the theatre before the show began, and it encouraged a certain amount of audience participation along the lines of, for instance, Godspell.

The production, starring Tim Curry, was brought to New York by Lou Adler where it was also successful.

In 1975, with several changes in cast and musical arrangements, The Rocky Horror Show of the floorboards became the Rocky Horror Picture Show on celluloid. This time, Richard O'Brien, in addition to masterminding the work, also starred in it as Riff Raff, the grotesque portentious handyman.

The movie had a disappointing first run, rarely playing for more than 2 weeks in major cities across North America. But the few people who did see it, seemed to share 2 characteristics - they enjoyed the unconventional, and they wanted to see the movie again.

Because of this, and because the majority of those who liked it were young, the show slowly started reappearing on college campuses and in second-run theatres in Canada and the U.S. This phenomenon eventually snowballed to the almost saturation point which has now been reached.

As a result of its incredible popularity, the movie has also proven an effective springboard to other careers for many of its stars. The corpulent, ultra-energetic Meatloaf, who plays Eddie, is now a household word amongst the bopper set.

Susan Sarandon, who played Janet,

From the day he was born
He was trouble.
He was the thorn
in his mother's side.
She tried in vain but he never Caused her nothing but shame.

has recently starred in Louis Malle's film, "Pretty Baby". Tim Curry, superlative as the famous "sweet transvestite" Dr. Frank'n Furter, (indeed, it is impossible to imagine anyone else in the role), now has a solo album out entitled, appropriately, "Read My Lips". Even Little Nell has a 45 out and will probably follow it with an album.

But why the astounding success, after an early failure? What is it that drives 2 extreme "Rocky Horror" addicts to undergo the sacrament of marriage in costume at a Los Angeles theatre? (He as Eddie, she as Columbia).

Why do supposedly sane people don tuxedos, party hats, grotesquely garish sunglasses and eagerly cavort down the aisles of Dunning Hall?

The main reason, of course, is that, in Richard O'Brien's words "the whole thing is a lot of fun." As the record jacket advertises, "Rocky Horror" contains "Action Packed Romance... Transylvanian Parties... Gorgeous Gals... Thrills and Chills... and Lotsa Laris and Sex" - all this in addition to "16 great songs."

The film's delightfully irreverent style is a major cause of its success. Its satire is not the vicious biting variety that leaves you feeling a bit queasy after seeing it. Rather it is totally tongue in cheek; it is a "wild and untamed thing" which is such a sheer joy to experience that it just leaves you yelling for more time warping at the end of it.

Its subject matter is daring enough to be risqué, (it was banned in South Africa), but its situations are so ludicrous and extreme, that they are entirely inoffensive to any reasonably free thinking person.

It is, in fact, in the unique and brilliantly original incongruity of its situations, that much of Rocky Horror's charm lies. The film's story does anything but flow smoothly forward. It is much more a series of excellent scenarios and superb songs loosely strung together to form a plot line.

Rocky Horror does not travel in a straight line from start to finish. Rather, it takes the viewer on a hopelessly convoluted and tortuous roller coaster ride which has a beginning and an end, only due to the conventions of the medium. For instance, although the climax of the movie is normally the closing, most fans would agree that there are numerous other scenes, (i.e. the time warp sequence; Frank N. Furter's entrance, the floor show), which are equally climactic.

In addition to the central action, there are innumerable little additions to scenes which every true fan takes pride in noticing. These range from the patently obvious (Brad and Janet's singing of a hyper-schmalzzy love duet in a graveyard); to the sublime (allusions to American Gothic and constant satire on the 'American Way' - Your apple pie don't taste too nice/you'd better wise up Janet Weiss); to the deliberately obscure (does anyone really know why the hell Riff Raff offers Magenta a half an eaten bagel in the Time Warp?).

It is perhaps this sense amongst the audience of being connoisseurs or initiates, which more than any other single factor accounts for Rocky Horror's tremendous popularity. At New York showings, where few people have seen the film less than five times, the audience supplies almost as much dialogue as the characters - all right on cue, of course.

There is total audience empathy with the movie. This extends to the point of audience members in costume miming crucial scenes directly beneath the screen while the "real" scenes are being projected.

"The day Eddie said he Didn't like his Teddie
You knew he was a no good kid.
But when he threatened your Life with a switchblade knife.
What a guy-makes you cry.
And I did.

Even in Kingston we are now assaulted by myriad cries of "I smell Meatloaf", immediately before the somewhat repellent scene in which Eddie is devoured by Frank N. Furter's unsuspecting guests. Masquerades are almost a regular part of any Rocky Horror showing.

Perhaps people enjoy being given a chance to become surrogate stars without having to worry about any of the rigours of the theatre. After all, they have a guaranteed receptive audience, since the crowd is as much a part of the festivities as the movie.

Unfortunately however, it must be noted that as the film attracts an increasingly mass following, it inevitably disenfranchises those who participated when they were still members of a dedicated cult. Already, the days are gone when you could count on an audience consisting mainly of artists, bohemians and freaks of every description at a Rocky Horror Picture Show screening. Like all offbeat spectacles, which become popular with the general public, its following has gravitated towards the middle of the road.

Thus while the movie itself obviously remains unchanged, the atmosphere surrounding it (which, you must remember, is half the fun), has been radically altered over 2 or 3 years. One might say that the status of Rocky Horror has moved from cult to fad. Although this change is lamentable to many of us, we can only hope that it is indicative not of a sheep mentality but of a raising of popular taste. And we must always remember that there is still the film itself.

What Rocky Horror viewer does not feel a delicious tingle of expectation when the house lights dim and Richard O'Brien's obscenely magnified, luxuriantly lascivious lips announce that "Micheal Rennie was ill the day the earth stood still but he told us where we stand."

Regardless of who sees it or why, the movie is undoubtedly a 70's classic (of which there are depressingly few) and is destined to endure for a long time as a prime expression of impudent satire, harmless hedonism and a tremendously clever imagination.

Give yourself over to absolute pleasure swim in the warm waters of sins of the flesh
erotic nightmares beyond any measure and sensual daydreams to treasure forever
can't you just see it - wo-wo-wo
Don't dream it

No Praise for "Older Women"

by Mark Henderson

If you have the misfortune to sit through In Praise of Older Women, you will discover that what follows the opening credits is both a dull movie and an insult to older women in general. After having caused a great controversy before its world premiere in Toronto a little more than one month ago, it is difficult to understand what all the fuss was about. I saw the uncut version, and it certainly contained nothing which I haven't seen in movies from the early 1970's. But the Ontario Censor Board has clamped down since then due to a new Chief Censor, even more narrow-minded than his predecessor. Just over thirty seconds were snipped from the prints of In Praise of Older Women now in circulation, apparently from three scenes featuring different actresses.

The film traces the sexual initiation and subsequent maturation of a young Hungarian lad, insipidly played by Tom Berenger. Attempts are made to fill out the story by reflecting upon the social and political situation of Hungary in the 1950's, a total failure. Berenger has affairs with an attractive intellectual (Karen Black), and a bouncy revolutionary type, so full of libidinous energy that she constantly exhausts him. When the Hungarian Revolution erupts, our young man flees to Canada (!?), and becomes involved with two more women. Very exciting indeed, or rather it could have been, had director George Kaczender given his characters more depth, allowing some very talented actresses to rise above their one-dimensional stereotyped roles. The script is atrocious (I won't bore you with an example), which, to sum up In Praise of Older Women's component parts, results in very little remaining entertainment value. Oh yes, much of the cinematography is quite pretty, but it too contributes to the banality of the whole affair.

Hopefully this film won't set a precedent for Canadian films of the future. Other than the presence of a couple of Canadian actresses in supporting roles and the use of Montreal as a location for the latter third of the film it could easily have been made in New York or Los Angeles. The censor Board's reaction to the film is very confusing. Although there were many boring scenes there weren't any that could be branded as objectionable. And if boring or bad can be equated with objectionable, why didn't they ban it altogether? But I suppose it's selfish of me to wish that the film had never been projected in front of my eyes, as it is an individual's prerogative to choose what he or she wants or does not want to see. When Secretary of State John Roberts opened the Toronto Festival of Festivals and introduced the film in question, he correctly expressed his (and my own) anger at having to go to Quebec to see Louis Malle's Pretty Baby due to the bias of a few individuals who are in the dubious position of imposing their sense of morality on the population of Ontario. Both the Censor Board and In Praise of Older Women are an insult to one's intelligence and we should get angry about the ridiculous manipulation of our entertainment and art.

Les Grands Ballets: a monumental effort

by Gillian Dobias

As the curtain rose at the Grand Theatre on Tuesday night, an almost undefinable electric current spilled over the stage and ignited the awaiting sense of the audience. Les Grands Ballets Canadiens was back in Kingston once again to captivate and inspire us.

Founded in 1952 by Ludmilla Chivriaeff, Les Grands Ballets Canadiens has been especially noted for its contemporary exploration of dance and its desire to encourage Canadian talent in the world of ballet. Both nationally and internationally the combination of these two powerful elements has been enthusiastically received.

The company possesses a vibrant, compelling youthfulness and a flawless technical strength to support it as it leaps through its creative evolution.

Versatility seems to be one of the chief attributes of the company. Tuesday night's performance consisted of three short ballets, touching on endless forms of expression, mood and style.

The program opened on a classical note with "Serenade", an exquisitely traditional ballet. It was a beautiful start to the evening. The rising curtain disclosed a blue tinted tableau of dancers identically poised, motionless, one arm outstretched, as the flowing music of Tchaikovsky filled the theatre.

This ballet is said to have no story, being merely "a dance in the light of the moon". And watching the dancers in their frothy blue costumes, they indeed seemed like particles of dust drifting and floating in the moon's rays.

The work was brilliantly choreographed by George Balanchine, relying not on symmetry, but rather on puzzle-like movements to form intertwining sequences and poses. The precision and timing of the dancers was reaching towards perfection.

The delight of the audience was captured by the second piece, entitled "Sonata for Cocktail Piano". Set to "razamatazz" ragtime music, the ballet was a light, unsophisticated take-off on the eccentrics at a cocktail party. In delightfully painted leotards the dancers overflowed with sparkle and vivacity. The freedom and ease with which the artists moved was remarkable and the expression they put into their dancing made a gem of a performance.

Les Grands Ballets Canadiens rounded off the evening with a very interesting and extremely effective contemporary ballet based on texts by Bertolt Brecht and set to music by Kurt Weill. "The Seven Deadly Sins" is an intricate mixture of multitudinous theatrical elements ranging from the operatic to vaudeville, ballet to acrobatics, mime to cabaret. The characteristic flavour of the Brecht/Weill partnership lingered throughout with its bizarre, absurd undertones and colourful original presentation.

The company acted out the journey of two sisters as they entered into "the seven deadly sins" in order to earn money for their family at home.

With so much visual stimulation it is easy to get carried away in their descriptions and explanations. This is by no means an indication of insignificant or unimpressive dancing. Images of orange and plum puddings "bouretting" onstage linger long in the memory, but the individual performances were equally memorable.

Pauline Julien displayed great talent in her role as Anna I, singing superbly in her raspy, dramatic voice the French cabaret-styled narrative that accompanies the ballet.

Louise Dore's performance as Anna II, the second sister, was exquisite, combining technical perfection with deep emotional expression.

The quality of dancing, acting and singing of the whole company was first rate. United and synchronized in both spirit and movement, they worked well together to give a dazzling performance.

As I left the Grand Theatre Tuesday night, I could not help but envy the next people who were to see the curtain rise on Les Grands Ballets Canadiens.

Soccer Gaels still in contention after draw

by Benny

The Soccer Gaels remained within striking distance of the league championship on Saturday, by playing to a 2-2 draw with Laurentian.

The following day Laurentian beat RMC while Western was losing to Toronto. The weekend results show Laurentian 2 points up on the Gaels in the fight for top spot and the home field advantage in the playoffs. However, Queen's has a game in hand and will finish up against RMC a team they have not lost to in over ten years. Should Laurentian and Queen's be equal at this point, the Gaels will get the nod for their superior goal average.

Saturday's match was played on the RMC field which allowed both teams to utilize the skills that rank them tops in the country. The magnificent weather seemed to bring out a fired-up enthusiasm that had been missing from the Gaels' training sessions all week.

9 Gaels named to ALL-STARS

by Don MacKinnon

It was announced Tuesday that the Queen's Golden Gaels, the only undefeated team in Canadian college football, had placed nine players on the O.Q.I.F.C. Eastern Division All-Star Team. In addition to the nine Gaels players selected, the Queen's coaching staff, under the tutelage of Head Coach Doug Hargreaves, were given the honour of being named "coach of the year."

Bob O'Doherty, the Gaels outstanding Wingback, was named the league's Most Valuable Player, which automatically puts him in the running for the M.V.P. in Canadian college football.

Offensively, as well as O'D's selection, the Gaels placed Center Pat Plishka, Guard Randy Edgeworth (for the 3rd year in a row) and Fullback Dave Marinucci on the All-Star Team. (Marinucci tied with Bishop's Bruce Wilkins at the fullback spot.)

From the ranks of one of the best defense's in the country, the Allstar team drew five Gaels. Defensive End Dick Bakker, Corner-linebacker John Vernon, and Monster Back Jim D'Andrea (all selected for the third straight year) were joined by Middle Linebacker Ed Andrew and Safety Ted Tyczka.

Following coach John Walker's axiom that "you play your best soccer when you play your best soccer," the Gaels proceeded to do just that. Short, effective passes and good running off the ball made them look like world-beaters in the early going, but the overanxiousness to attack left gaps in the defense. One such mistake proved very costly as the Voyageurs jumped into a 1-0 lead. Again the leading ability of Andy Goodman and the coolness shown by Austin McGhie from the penalty shot busted the boys in gold back on top. The halftime interval unfortunately seemed to cut into the drive of the Gaels and again Laurentian wasted no time in equalizing.

The remainder of the match resembled everything from excellent soccer to a rugby scrum, as both teams fought for the go-ahead goal. Carl Saunders epitomized the varying quality of the play as he came off the line brilliantly to challenge the shooters, but in the next instant let rolling shots slip through his grasp. Laurentian nearly snatched the 2 points as they hit the post and had two chances cleared off the line. At the other end, Queen's muffed a free kick attempt that would have sent them home winners.

When the dust finally settled it seemed that the Voyageurs were pleased with the tie while Queen's was itching for another go at the boys from the north. Perhaps the latter will have their wish as both teams are assured of playoff berths.

The regular schedule comes to and end this weekend and still the third and fourth place teams have yet to be decided. What amounts to the closest race in years sees Waterloo, U of T, York, and Western all scrambling to make the final two spots. The Queen's-RMC match will be played on the cadet's home field on Saturday with the kickoff at 2pm. Those who can't afford football tickets are welcome to attend at no charge.

Field hockey gals in midst of finals

by Pearl Dixon and Gillian Young

This weekend the Queen's Field Hockey Teams travelled to Toronto for Part I of their season finals. The weather cooperated and both teams appear to be in the running this year.

The Senior team met their toughest opponent Toronto, in their first contest Saturday morning. The first half showed some good drives by both teams but Toronto managed to get the lone goal. The second half was not as even in play and Toronto scored twice. The final score was 3-0.

In the second game of the day the Seniors met McGill. They played much better but only scored once, a goal by Bev Koski, losing 2-1 to McGill.

By the third game the gals were really hungry. York had beaten Queen's in the Early Bird Tournament and were quite confident. Queen's aggressive play allowed them to control the play for the entire game. The first goal of this game was scored by Jane Wegenast of Queen's. York then retaliated with a fluke goal. The gals wouldn't give up. They were awarded a penalty flick and Jan Hazelwood's shot was good. In the second half Jan scored again. The final score was 3-1 for Queen's.

Queen's seniors are now tied with McGill and York for second place

With the Nationals in Toronto this year two Ontario teams will qualify. This second spot is still within Queen's reach if they can come up with four wins next weekend against the weaker Western Division.

The intermediate teams weekend also began with a tough game against Toronto. Although the girls weren't playing their best hockey they managed to prevent Toronto from scoring but Toronto also prevented Queen's from scoring so 0-0 was the final outcome. That was Queen's second tie with Toronto this year so when the girls meet them next weekend they will have a chance to break this trend.

Later on in the day Queen's met the very aggressive team from Laurentian. They managed to outplay Queen's in the first half with a 2-0 lead so the Queen's girls played a strong second half and came back with a beautiful goal from rookie center Sue Tsikwa bringing the score to 2-1. Laurentian got one final goal on a lucky short corner shot so the final score was 3-1.

The intermediates best game was early Sunday morning against Trent. The plays that had been tried in practice were finally working on the pitch. The first goal came from a good solid shot by half back Linda Murdock with the assist going to Heike Ziss. This rookie pair then tried the same play minutes later to get the second Queen's goal of the game. With hard work on both offensive and defensive plays the Queen's girls managed to stay in control throughout the entire game. Several good rushes were made by full back "Granny" Cindy Shantz who got the ball to the half backs who then neatly fed the ball to the forwards which led to one final goal for Queen's Sue Tsikwa put it in so the final score was 3-0. Queen's goalie Lori Livingston got her second shut-out of the weekend.

This weekend leaves the girls very optimistic about their upcoming tournament. Next weekend the intermediate girls will travel to York for Part II of their tournament. They will meet each of these teams again so if they can come up with 3 wins then they could be able to hold onto their title as Ontario Intermediate Champions.

Field hockey gals knock about in headlong rush after the bouncing ball.

Intermediates to prove who's best

This weekend, the Intermediate Field Hockey team will be going to York University to play in Part 2 of the Ontario University Champions. For the gals, the season up to date has been exceptionally good, especially for a team consisting mostly of rookies. Only two veterans are back from last year's squad—Gillian Young, this year's captain, and Cindy Shantz. At the moment the team is tied for second with Toronto, three points behind undefeated Laurentian. Last weekend's setbacks came on the first day, when the Intermediates tied their first game with Toronto, and lost a scrappy match to Laurentian. As their coach explained, "With so many rookies on the team, there was undoubtedly a lot of nervousness over the first day of intercollegiate competition. Laurentian exploited well the hole we tended to leave in the middle of the field—this won't be there for them this weekend." With Saturday's initiation behind them, the Gals performed well against Trent on the Sunday.

This weekend, the team once again plays U of T, Laurentian and Trent for the final placings of the season. With only three games remaining, a little luck is needed, and in order to have a chance to win the title, they must rely on Toronto to force a tie with Laurentian, a team which defeated them 3-0 last weekend. For the Queen's team, the objectives are well laid out by team captain Gillian Young—"We are going to play each game to prove to all other Intermediate teams that Queen's is the best team in its division."

Seniors hope for nationals

If you happen to see any of the members of the Senior Women's Field Hockey Team around campus today, don't hesitate to step up and wish them "good luck" for the weekend. Pearl Dixon, Marie Miller, Lyn Allison, Bev Koski, Jan Hazelwood, Jane Wagenest, Janine Ennis, Laurie Boyce, Mary Brunton, Janine Lamar, Lauren Gallagher, Karen Pillow and Sue Senior have their work cut out for them. Four games will be played and in order for Queen's to qualify for the Nationals, the team must be victorious in all four. Although Queen's has got the skill and the power to handle McMaster, Waterloo, Guelph and Western, the games definitely cannot be taken for granted. Queen's is going to have to dig in this weekend with a fresh attitude, renewed drive and goal-hungry determination. Every bit of inspiration is going to count. (Remember team - it's yours if you want it, so LET'S GO FOR IT)

Athlete of the Week

Brian MacLeod
Several Queen's athletes had outstanding performances during this past week, as Queen's continues to bask in the delights of one of its most successful autumns of athletics.

The honour of being Queen's Athlete of the Week goes to Brian MacLeod of the Golden Gaels Volleyball Team. He led the way offensively and defensively as Queen's captured the Brock Invitational Tournament. MacLeod's excellent play kept team morale high and ultimately contributed to the victory in the finals over the perennially strong Guelph Gryphons. In his first year as a starter, Brian MacLeod is already establishing himself as a key contributor to the Queen's Volleyball Team.

Other notable performances were displayed by Dan MacIntosh of the Rugby Gaels and the Men's Track and Field Team.

Playing a splendid strategic game at fly-half, MacIntosh was the standout of the thirty men on the field as Queen's handled York 22-3.

The men's Track & Field Team totally dominated the OUAAs finals to retain the title won last year. N.C. After 432 days without scoring, one of Queen's Rugby Gaels came through in brilliant fashion in a National Championship. The quality of the other performances this week, though, entails that this big event go "unrecognized".

P.S. All nomination forms for Athlete of the Week must be handed into Rick Powers in the P.E.C. by Monday. The selection committee regrets that no coaches (or supporters) of women's teams have yet had occasion to compliment any of our Golden Gals.

We're Number One - Again!

by Jeff Bellinger

It took the Queen's men's Track and Field team over seventy years to win the OUAA Championship, but all the years of finishing second ended last year at McMaster University as Queen's won its first title. They were paced last year by such excellent athletes as Victor Gooding, Bob McCormick, Kevin Thompson, and Tony Verhovan. Each of these athletes were in their last years of competition last year and the loss of their talents looked to be a tremendous disadvantage to this year's team.

Duncan Card, double silver medalist

Although this year's team went into the finals as defending champions, it was expected to be a very tough race between three teams: Queen's, U of T, and McMaster. This was not the case however, as the men from Queen's put together one of its best team performances ever. When the results of the meet were tallied, Queen's had outdistanced U of T by 44 points and McMaster by 98. This was an even wider margin over the previous year.

Queen's has always been strong in the sprint events and this held true last week-end as well. Duncan Card led the way with two silver medals in both the 100 and 200 metres. Tony Posteraro picked up the third place bronze in the 200. In the 400m, team captain, Jim Wilson pulled off yet another silver medal for the team. Charlie Hitchon was just edged out of third place.

In the two relays, the sprint men showed their tremendous style by "blowing" the opposition away. Card, Wilson, Posteraro, and Peter Becke took the 4 x 100m in a time of 42.8 - a mere one tenth of a second off the OUAA record. In the 4 x 400m, Posteraro and Wilson again ran, this time teamed with Charlie Hitchon and rookie Chris Reid. They all ran excellent splits and finished five seconds ahead of second place U of T.

Queen's captured more gold in the 800m as Charlie Hitchon ran a fine 1:54.9 to win. He had finished second the year before behind Bob McCormick who won in 1:57.0. In the metric mile (1500m) Bob Graham captured the bronze for the second year in a row. Dale Frieson picked up the fourth spot.

Queen's men were up against very rough competition in the distance races, but held up very well. Adam Shoemaker took a silver in the 5000m. He ran the third fastest time of his life. Mike Guida, who ran the 10,000m earlier, placed fifth. In that 10,000m, Mike picked up a silver with Claus Rinne taking fifth spot. Adam's 14:21.0 and Mike's 30:49.4 were both good for new Queen's records.

Queen's took every gold medal in the hurdle events again showing their power on the track. Rookie Chris Reid ran a personal best (PB) in the 400m hurdles to capture the gold. Jim Morrison also PB'ed in taking third. Paul Tinzu did the same in his fifth place finish. In the 110m hurdles, Jim Morrison again high-stepped to win the gold. In the 3000m Steeplechase, three men from Queen's scored points. Jeff Bellinger ran a 9:32.0 after pulling off a very smooth move under water at the hazard for first place and a new Queen's record. Colin Funk in his first year at Queen's, placed fourth while Dale Frieson finished sixth.

The Queen's Field men were supposedly weak this year, but they disproved that by taking two individual OUAA championships on their way to scoring 34 points. The second best score of any team from the field. Mark Evans led the way with a gold in the Discus (42.60) and a fifth in the Shot Put. Mark Judge won the Pole Vault (don't believe everything you read in The Globe) with a vault of 4.20 which breaks yet another Queen's record. Al MacDonald, another top rookie, placed sixth. Mark Diboll placed seventh in the Javelin. In the Jumping Events, team captain Peter Becke took the silver in the triple with a distance of 13.99. He also placed fifth in the Long Jump. Graham Boyle took the sixth in the Triple Jump. In the high jump, competition was very good and rookie Steve Waring leaped 1.97m to finish fifth. This was only three centimeters off the winning jump. It was also a new Queen's record by seven centimeters.

It was certainly a "tremendous team effort" as Head Coach Rolf Lund expressed after the meet. Eight gold medals had been taken out of a possible seventeen. The team outdistanced a field of eleven teams quite easily on their way to a second OUAA team championship in as many years. Rumors are circulating that the Queen's Track and Field Dynasty had only begun.

Graham Boyle leaps to a seventh place finish in the long jump.

Something for everyone

Athletics at Queen's

Queen's Athletic Program: One of the best in Canada

by Mark Pentland

Among universities, Queen's offers one of, if not the most extensive intercollegiate programs in Canada. The women's intercollegiate program consists of nineteen Ontario Women's Intercollegiate Athletic Association (O.W.I.A.A.) sanctioned teams - the largest contingent in Ontario. Twenty-two men's intercollegiate teams compete in the Ontario Universities Athletic Association (O.U.A.A.) - a far cry from the three or four teams which Ottawa U. and Carleton U. can afford to enter.

The Intramural programs at Queen's are exceptional. The Women's Intramural Committee (W.I.C.) offers thirteen team sports and eleven individual sports to female students. Men's Intramurals (BEWS) has competitors in thirty-two different team and individual sports. Both WIC and BEWS stress participation and leave the competition aspect as an option to those participating.

Recreation Services are designed to provide a multitude of opportunities for members of the Queen's community to participate in physical activity. The Sports Skills Instructional Program provides students, faculty and staff with instruction in a wide variety of individual sports. These programs are self-supporting with registration fees, and aim towards a "break-even" budget. A certain percentage of the Student Athletic Fee is designated for grants to the particular clubs to aid in the operation of these clubs.

Recreation Services also encourages

Where your athletic $ goes

Presently, at Queen's, all students pay a Student Athletic Fee of $25.00 as a part of their tuition fees. There often appears to be confusion and misinformation about what the $25.00 is spent on and to what extent students pay for athletics. Unlike other universities, students at Queen's do not pay for any administrative costs of athletics. The casual recreation amongst the Queen's population. To this end, an attempt is made, by the Physical Education Centre staff, to schedule at least one gymnasium to be free of intercollegiate, intramural and School of Physical and Health Education use, so that any one in the University may use that gym for their personal recreation. This task is not an easy one, especially when you observe the vastness of the Queen's Athletic Program. However, a gym should be available everyday during the so-called "peak" periods of the day (that is, between 11:30 and 1:30 and between 4:30 and 5:30). Of course, many other time slots during the day have open gym time, and it is there for your recreational use. In addition, the Arena and the outdoor fields are open to the Queen's population for use at given time periods during the day. The Pool and the Arena offer scheduled recreation swim time and skating time at "peak" times of the day, in order that many students and staff can utilize these facilities.

How good is the Queen's athletic program? Well, with the five excellent programs attempting to meet the needs of almost every kind of potential participant and succeeding - it seems to me that the athletic program at Queen's is simply outstanding!

Queen's student athletic fee does not pay for maintenance of the athletic facilities. The fee does not cover salaries of all coaches of intercollegiate teams. The Queen's student athletic fee does go to what is referred to as the athletics "operating budget."

Each of the five committees submits a budget requesting funds to meet such expenses as equipment, travel, accommodation, meals and officials. The UCA appoints a sub-committee (consisting of three students and two staff) to review and adjust these budget submissions, according to the expected revenues of the athletics "operating budget." This sub-committee analyses all budgets fairly and with an open mind. Their goal is to ensure that each committee receives sufficient funds to maintain its individual programs at the high level which now exists.

Certain costs are absorbed by two or more committees. The Recreation-Intramural equipment "pool" is such a case. A certain percentage of the Student Athletic Fee is used for purchasing equipment to be used by intramural and recreation programs. This equipment, ranging from squash rackets to team sweaters, is used by a large number of Queen's students and consequently, it must be replaced on a fairly regular basis. Much effort is put into buying equipment that will be of reasonable quality to withstand the constant use it must endure. Thus, any student who plays intramurals or utilizes the equipment from the Physical Education Centre recreationally, is really using equipment which he/she has helped pay for through the Student Athletic Fee and through small rental fees for breakable equipment.

Your athletic fee goes toward everything from cross country skis to basketballs and hockey sticks.

What is U.C.A.?

The body charged with the control of all phases of athletics at Queen's is called the University Council on Athletics (UCA). Since its inception in 1970, the Council has developed all major policies concerning athletics and has coordinated rules and policies devised by its sub-committees.

There are five major committees which make up the UCA: 1) Recreation Services; 2) Men's Intercollegiate Athletics; 3) Women's Intercollegiate Athletics; 4) Men's Intramural Athletics; 5) Women's Intramural Athletics. Each of these committees sends two elected representatives (one of whom in each case is a student, and one a non-student) to sit on the Council. Three Senate appointees (two of whom are students), the Director of the School of Physical and Health Education, and the executive officers of each of the five committees (who are non-voting members who serve in advisory capacities) make up the balance of the Council members.

The UCA meets once a month, usually the second Tuesday of each month. Meetings are open to the Queen's population, although voting is restricted to the fourteen elected or appointed representatives.

You'll discover more about sports in Sports Skills instruction than you would ever find between the pages of a book.

Rugby faces crucial game

by Don Cameron

The Queen's Rugby Gaels came through in the clutch with two decisive wins against York University.

The second XV Gaels played a hardhitting game against the Yeomen. For the first twenty minutes of the match the ball stayed largely among the forwards. The Gaels' forwards, led by Dave 'Herman' Bonnet, John Corrigan, and Peter McQuaig, managed to thwart all York's efforts to score.

Bloemen continued to show his skill as a "bulldozer," driving into rucks and mauls with no-holds-barred abandon. Queen's put their first points on the scoreboard with a try credited to Rick Funtham from an obstruction penalty called against the Yeomen. Paul Lemmon converted to make the score 6-0.

The second half was much the same as the first, with both teams' backs getting little opportunity to run with the ball. Queen's rounded out the scoring on two penalty kicks by Paul Lemmon, to give them a 12-0 victory.

The Rugby Gaels' seconds thus remain in sole possession of first place, with a perfect 6-0 record.

The first XV Rugby Gaels allowed only a penalty field goal in their 26-3 win over the York Yeomen. Queen's backs showed excellent form throughout the game accounting for 5 of the 6 tries scored. Defensively the Gaels' forwards played well out pushing the heavier York pack. Gord Nixon and Bill Payne were standouts among the forwards successfully containing York's scrum and fly half. Dan MacIntosh (the BC Wonder Boy) from his fly half position ran circles around the York team, scoring one try. John Reid, in as full back, scored two tries and assisted on a third to Slattery which brought the capacity crowd to their feet. The remaining tries were scored by Payne and Vaughn with Reid kicking the convert.

This Saturday the Gaels travel to Toronto to play the Blues. Victory over U of T will guarantee them a spot in the playoffs.

A swarm of teammates accompany Dan MacIntosh as he surges past a York defender for a try. His score helped nail down a 26-3 victory.

A sober look at an abused privilege

As fans trek to Richardson stadium this weekend to cheer the gridiron heroics of our Golden Gaels it is a fitting time to turn an eye toward the not so heroic activities of some of the students in the stands.

As a rule most of the fans are out for a good time. However there is a small contingent of habitually intoxicated students who show a general disregard for the rights of other students, and in their rowdiness, endanger others as well as themselves.

It is not difficult to single out alcohol as the major accomplice in the acts of this minority. As a result of similar incidents, the University of Western Ontario banned drinking at their games two years ago. After this ban the number of reported incidents of assault and damage plummeted from forty-two to just two.

The banning of alcohol in George Richardson stadium would be a regrettable development for most students who are able to indulge but still control themselves. However, we must decide whether we can justifiably continue a tradition that unquestionably leads to a small but significant number of personal injuries. Training to be critics of society we cannot falter at turning a critical eye upon ourselves.

AMS Chief Constable Colin Carter reports there are several minor injuries in the stands each game with an ambulance being in frequent demand. He said he generally expects to handle up to three passed out students every game. Last game a girl suffered a badly injured leg and had to be carried away while a drunken student climbed a light pole, endangering not only himself, but those below him.

Each year people are disturbed about the extreme cases of rowdiness at the football games, yet each year, as sure as the first snow, the AMS lets the chance to do anything slip by. Last fall the AMS actually went as far as seriously discussing the matter but there was no discernible action taken at that time.

This issue is one that demands a careful consideration. It is not a question that should be decided by referendum but should rather be discussed in an open forum and analyzed in depth by a special committee.

Queen's at the moment is in an enviable position as it is one of the few schools where bringing alcohol into games is still allowed. It is privilege we all enjoy. But, it is not one students should take for granted, simply because our student government has yet to take the initiative to do anything.

Reconstitute board

The role of students in the administration of our residences has, on occasion, been a topic that has generated heated debate. At the beginning of this decade, students had little input in the policy-making of the university's residences. Rules of conduct, rules of admittance into residences of members of the opposite sex, as well as budgets and fees were all set by university administrators.

Students in the early seventies, dissatisfied with their inability to participate in formulating the policies which governed them, took up the issue and, over time, succeeded in restructuring both the policies and the method for devising policy.

Since then, students have signally failed to pursue these early demands for greater representation. Queen's student participation in the administration of our residences presently lags far behind four of five other universities contacted by the Journal.

With only five students of the nineteen-member Residences Board, the interests of students are highly prone to circumvention. As a case in point, our residence fees are the highest in Ontario.

The Residences Board should be reconstituted, as is the case at Western, McGill and Carleton, so that the student-administrator ratio is 50/50. Only under such an arrangement can the legitimate concerns and interests of the students that live in residence be effectively and fairly represented in the selection of dons and wardens, in the hiring and firing of the food distributor, in the budget and in the setting of fees—all these issues directly affect students, and it is students who must be given the capacity to control them.

More violence in stands

by John Bakla

A student may face charges following an incident of alleged physical assault at Saturday's football game.

Brian Baldwin, a third-year History major, was charged by the Kingston Police with the minor offence of intoxication and was briefly held at police headquarters.

The arrest followed a violent outbreak in the stands where several spectators were assaulted. According to witnesses at the scene, the scuffle took place during the first overtime period of the game.

Witnesses stated that Baldwin was stumbling "all over the place" and was flailing his arms and hitting people in the stands. The fight was broken up by Paul Kealey and AMS Sergeant Pat Flanagan who then escorted Baldwin to the exit.

"We had to sit on him until the cops arrived," said Kealey. "He was completely out of line."

"He was rowdy and obnoxious," said Greg Goodall, who had his glasses broken in the skirmish. "Whether it was intentional or not, we don't have to put up with that garbage. He has to bear the responsibility for his actions."

Celia Russell, who was struck in the head during the incident stated she would bring the case to A.M.S. Court for a decision.

"He has to be taught a lesson," said Russell. "I'm going to contact the A.M.S. Court and see what they can do about it."

Students directly involved in the occurrence have two choices of action if charges want to be pressed. They could charge Baldwin with assault or bring the case up to A.M.S. Court.

"I'm not out to screw him but I don't have to put up with that type of behaviour," said Goodall.

Both Russell and Goodall would be "satisfied with an apology." Goodall also wants compensation for his broken glasses.

"The whole incident was rather unfortunate," stated Gwen Richardson who was at the scene. "It just got out of hand."

"Too bad these things happen," "but they do," said a Kingston policeman at the information desk.

"This was probably the biggest incident of the year," said Colin Carter, AMS Chief Constable. "Although the fans on the whole were not as rowdy this game compared to other games."

Rugged defense kept the Gaels alive in a lacklustre semi-final. Here, the special team holds a meeting with Carleton's Pinnock.

OFS plans picket protest

by Tom Mohr

A mass informational picket has been planned for November 16 at Queen's Park by the Ontario Federation of Students (OFS). At an emergency plenary meeting of the executive, it was decided that the picket strategy was the most effective means of voicing dissent on the issue of government cutbacks.

AMS President Dave Brown, who cast the Queen's vote in favour of the action, stressed that the November 16 picket will not be a rally.

"People will be moving in an orderly fashion, there will be no speakers, and it basically won't have that rally focus," he said.

"I don't think it's a bad idea. It's a horrible idea if it degenerates into a rally-like confrontation. OFS is planning it very carefully so that it won't. They want to make sure that it is what it says: a mass information picket line," he added.

Brown indicated that, unlike last year's March 16 Rally, the picket will be for those who are serious and highly motivated by the issues involved in the whole anti-cutbacks campaign.

"This must be construed as a demonstration of genuine political commitment," he said. "The people who are going to participate have to know the issues, they must be prepared to walk for two hours in the cold, and realize that they aren't going to be entertained by speeches and folk singers. This is their time for commitment," he said.

Sunday's plenary meeting of the OFS executive was to have considered a fall strategy in the light of expected tuition fee announcements by the Ministry of Colleges and Universities for the coming year. It now appears there will be no announcement until after the Christmas break.

Campus Comment

This week, October 30 to November 3, is Cutbacks Week here at Queen's. Universities across Ontario are holding similar informational weeks on their campuses. At Queen's in particular, our increase in funding this year will not keep pace with the rate of inflation so we are, in fact, facing cutbacks in real dollar terms.

Students were asked:

- (1) Were you aware of these cutbacks?
- (2) Have cutbacks affected you in any way at all? Do you know of any areas on campus which have been affected?
- (3) Do you know what students have been doing to combat these cutbacks and what do you think of their methods?
- (4) What are your suggestions on how cutbacks can be opposed effectively?

Jim Nugent Arts '81

Jim said he was aware of the cutbacks but hadn't been affected by them as of yet. However, he noted that his living expenses had gone up about 12% and that his summer earnings might not be enough to put him through this year. Thus, OSAP might be necessary.

Jim felt his class size was too large and the "Profs just don't seem to be around to talk to." He knows of friends who have had to borrow money from other sources because OSAP didn't provide enough for them.

Jim said, "I can't see much that we can do about it. But marches on Queen's Park might do something. If we bug them enough they should do something."

Diane Olchowick, 4th year Politics

Diane said she was aware of the cutbacks because of the posters on campus and articles in the Journal. She stated that she had noticed the effects of cutbacks, explaining that, "talking to Profs, they say they haven't been able to increase their staff, even though class sizes have increased."

Diane knew all about the OFS petition which is being circulated, and had heard about the rally at Confederation Park over cutbacks and unemployment.

In conclusion, Diane felt, "Students in general aren't radical enough to put up a strong opposition to cutbacks. She said students would only rebel indirectly by demanding more student assistance once tuition is raised."

Richard Row, 4th year Fine Arts

"Yes I'm aware of the cutbacks. I did represent student needs to government but she's just not doing the with QSACU in that the government job she's supposed to do."

approach to cutbacks is not good.

Richard, however, did not agree with all of QSACU's position. He said they were against all cutbacks and wanted grants, not loans. "But in a way, the students have been made to look greedy. I don't agree that there should be no cutbacks at all because we all have to bear the brunt of it."

Richard was aware of some of the cutbacks on campus because, "Ontario Hall was supposed to get a technician for the studio, but apparently we can't afford it."

In conclusion, Richard said, "I understand the government's position that there must be cutbacks. But more cooperation between government and students is needed. Bette Stevenson is supposed to represent student needs to government but she's just not doing the job she's supposed to do."

If you have space stack your freezer

by Tom Mohr

A growing number of students in off-campus houses are taking advantage of a cost-saving measure in the purchase of food. The miracle purse-saver? Quantity discounts.

Claire Smith of 301 Earl St. describes her house's arrangement.

"We get together with three houses, and make bulk purchases of meat at John's Delicatessen. The savings are quite significant. We're getting sirloin steak for cheaper than most people get hamburger."

John's offers hamburger at $1.09 a pound, compared with regular retail prices, which fluctuate around $1.50 a pound. A minimum purchase of ten pounds is required. Sirloin steak sells at a tempting $1.49 a pound, with a minimum 25 pound purchase.

"The advantage is that it's cheaper. That's it. You can eat much better food for the same price."

"They slice it, package it. You just come home and throw it in your freezer. It's even cheaper than stewing meat," Smith noted.

She strongly suggests that other students take up the idea, noting that in terms of salvaging a tight budget, "you just can't beat it."

$2 for a beer

by Karen McNeil

Queen's students will soon be required to show Age of Majority cards if asked by AMS constables when drinking at either the Underground or McLaughlin Room pubs.

The new crackdown is a result of the government's decision to raise the legal drinking age to 19, as of January 1, 1979. This means that many Queen's students will be underage, and, according to Sheila Murray, Queen's Student Agency Director, the Kingston police are determined to stamp out underage drinking.

"We've already been canvassed by the police once, checking for I.D. They are aware that there are underage students and they're testing us," she said.

Therefore, the Underground and the McLaughlin Room will accept only age of majority cards beginning on January 1. If there is doubt in a constable's mind as to the age of the customer, and no age of majority card can be produced, then the customer will be turned away, even if they can show other pieces of identification.

"We are requesting that people get age of majority cards because that's the only thing which will protect us. If an underage student is caught in the pub with no I.D., or with false I.D. which is not an age of majority card, the pub will be closed for 7 days, as well as having a fine imposed on it," Sheila said. "Also, every bar in town that we contacted is doing the same thing."

The move to more strict control may cause some students difficulties, however, said Murray. "The problem is that the Ontario government may not issue cards to out of province students. Whether there will be any allowances for them, remains to be seen."

Students may be able to avoid this dilemma, however, by putting Kingston as their place of permanent residence, since they live here for eight months in the year, adds Murray.

The cards can be picked up at clinics set up on Wednesday and Thursday of this week in the central meeting area of the John Deutsch Centre. A Birth certificate, one other piece of identification and 2 dollars are necessary to get a card.

Plastic industry moguls are smiling too as age of majority cards become yet another wallet fatterer.

Award recognition of excellence in teaching

Special

Students have an opportunity to show approval of their professors by nominating them for the Alumni Award for Excellence in Teaching. The Award consists of a Certificate of Merit and a $1000. cash prize.

Nominations must be in writing, signed by five students, faculty and/or alumni and submitted to the Director of Alumni Affairs, Queen's University by 21 January, 1979. The nomination should include the candidate's name in full; the faculty and subject; a brief biographical outline, including education and experience, and reasons for recommending him/her for the Excellence in Teaching Award.

Candidates for the award must be full time members of the Queen's University teaching staff, who have completed three years of full time teaching duties at Queen's. Nominations should strive to choose teachers who have enthusiasm for the subject and the capacity to arouse interest in it among the students. Candidates should have a comprehensive knowledge of the subject and be habitually well prepared for teaching sessions including lectures, laboratories and seminars. They should be able to communicate effectively with students, encourage student participation in the teaching-learning process, be accessible to students outside of class hours and have a reputation for superior teaching among students and colleagues alike.

All nominations will be reviewed by a Teaching Awards Committee consisting of three students, two staff members and two alumni. The Award Recipient will be announced in April and will receive the Award at an appropriate Spring Convocation.

The 1978 recipient of the award was Prof. Catherine R. Harland of the Department of English.

Gets degree at 81

Doug Ronson

Among the six hundred graduates who received degrees Saturday at Fall Convocation was a very special lady, Helen Campbell, who turned 81 this September.

Mrs. Campbell is the oldest person ever to be awarded an earned degree by Queen's. She began working towards her English degree at age 75. "Six years of hard and, at times, frustrating and discouraging work", she says. One of her thirteen grandchildren graduated with her.

Campbell graduated from high school at age 16 and was immediately thrust into a teaching position in a one room schoolhouse.

She retired from teaching after six years to become a farmer's wife. In the '40's the Campbells moved to Kingston and Mrs. Campbell spent the next 30 years running a boardinghouse.

Mrs. Campbell has recorded some of her experiences as a teacher and farmer's wife in a book entitled, From Chalkdust to Hayseed.

Mrs. Campbell received her degree along with the other graduates from the Right Honourable Roland Michener, Queen's Chancellor.

Butterflies are sexist!

by Al Hart

Scenic textbooks and field guides are sexist, according to Dr. Marylee Stephenson of McMaster University. In her presentation in Dunning Auditorium last Thursday night, "Butterflies Aren't Free: Sexism in popular Science Books", Dr. Stephenson listed three main problems with literature of this type.

They are products of a discipline dominated by one sex; they portray a male-centred universe, and they discuss male characteristics almost exclusively, often denigrating those of the female, Stephenson maintains.

She cited as an example a sixteen page field guide in which only the male species of animals were pictured. Another chauvinistic attitude was detected in a naturalists' description of a "brooding female duck awakening, then tactlessly chasing the male".

Although this (phenomenon) is not as pernicious as sexual stereotyping in children's books, it is significant in considering the near-religious status given science today, Stephenson said.

New wave band is barred by AMS, QEA

Staff

"Battered Wives" will not be appearing with Elvis Costello this Saturday night at Jock Hardy Arena due to a strong negative reaction among portions of the Queen's student body. In their place, the three-man rock band, Goddo will be backing guitarist Costello.

After being approached by Concert Productions International (CPI) to produce both Costello and Grease, the Queen's Entertainment Agency decided to sponsor only one of the performances, and agreed to cancel Grease in favour of Costello.

Negative reaction to the band's name, "Battered Wives", led the AMS Inner Council and QEA to decide that it was not in the student body's interest to see them. Mark Opzomer, QEA Director, stated that there was a "social responsibility" not to have the "Wives" perform before Queen's students.

As Costello and the Wives are a package deal on a Canada wide tour, the Battered Wives will still be paid even though they will not be performing.

Cancelling the band will cost the AMS $500. According to President Dave Brown the original contract with Great Canadian Rock Tours called for the AMS to get 50 cents per ticket. The same deal will still apply, but GCRT is guaranteed the bulk payment regardless of sales.

Costello will be without "Wives".

World happenings in brief

by Rob Southcott

OTTAWA - The Canadian Union of Postal Workers decided to comply with federal back-to-work legislation and returned to work after a week-long strike. The action came just after union offices and files had been raided by the RCMP, and five union leaders, including CUPW President Jean-Claude Parrot, had been served arrest warrants. On Friday, the CUPW announced that it would take the federal government to court to challenge the constitutionality of the back-to-work legislation.

OTTAWA - Former RCMP Commissioner William Higgitt stated to the Macdonald Commission on RCMP wrongdoing, that three successive Solicitor Generals had been told about RCMP officers using illegal methods of investigation. Lawyers for the RCMP are now battling with Government lawyers over the release of certain federal Cabinet documents, which the RCMP says would back up Higgitt's statements.

STOCKHOLM - Israeli Prime Minister Menachem Begin and Egyptian President Anwar Sadat were declared joint winners of the 1978 Nobel Peace Prize. The prize was awarded to them for their continued efforts in bringing about peace in the Middle East.

HAMILTON - Firestone of Canada Inc. will recall about one million radial tires next week. The move follows last week's recalling in the United States of about 10 million of the same tires by Firestone. The recall of the Firestone 500 steel-belted radial tires is expected to cost Canadian and U.S. divisions of the company a combined total of over $250 million.

TORONTO - After pleading guilty to a charge of possession of heroin, Rolling Stoner Keith Richard was sentenced to one year parole and to play a concert for the Canadian National Institute for the Blind. It seems that the presiding judge may have underestimated the popularity of Richard in assigning him to play in the CNIB amphitheatre, which holds 500 people, but it's possible that the CNIB will accept Maple Leaf Gardens owner Harold Ballard to have Richard and friends use the Gardens, with front row seats for the blind.

LUSAKA, Zambia - Rhodesians staged an air raid on a Zambian civilian camp, killing over 200 people and wounding over 600. The raid has caused black nationalist leader Joshua Nkomo to break off peace talks with the white Rhodesian government of Prime Minister Ian Smith.

WASHINGTON - Billy Carter, brother of President Jimmy Carter, has been signed by CBS to act in a movie. The film, which is to be titled "Flatbed and Sweetie: Lady Truckers" will have Carter playing the role of a rural deputy sheriff in a plot involving a truck hijacking.

DUBLIN, Ireland - The home of Irish whiskey has finally jumped on the wagon due to a dramatic increase in the number of alcohol-related road accidents. Irish police have introduced the breathalyzer to Ireland's roads. Apparently, Irish police have been seen enforcing the new regulations as early as 10:30 in the morning.

Committee set up to support right to strike

by Elizabeth Dewart

A "Committee to Support the Right to Strike" has recently been formed in Kingston. The committee is composed of Queen's students and staff and other members of the Kingston community. Thirty-five people showed up for the first meeting, held last Thursday, although only two days notice was given.

Ron Baxter, present chairman of the committee, said recent government legislation ordering striking postal workers back to work, and subsequent RCMP raids on CUPW offices, were only the starting point for the committee's concerns. Government actions against postal workers are "only representative of a broader trend; the issue goes beyond postal workers," Baxter said.

Baxter went on to cite government actions taken against shipping unions and hospital workers' unions as "part of a trend of government...to deal with strikes in a legislative manner. And when that doesn't work, the government moves to increasingly escalating (and)...pretty heavy scare tactics," he added.

Bob Hackett, a Queen's grad student on the committee, noted the importance of workers' right to withdraw their labour power as their only effective way of defending their interests. "Without the right to strike, trade unions would be a farce," he added.

Baxter emphasized that, as well as supporting specifically the right to strike, the committee's purpose is to "mount an opposition towards Government policies." He sees the recent government actions against CUPW as "an infringement on basic rights. Once it happens to one union, there's nothing to prevent it from happening to any union," he said.

"The RCMP raid on the CUPW office calls into question the right of any union to organize," he explained.

Baxter suggested these events should be seen "against the backdrop of the Liberals preparing for an election in the spring. It's easy for the government to spend money to play up public antagonism against striking workers," he said. Baxter added that postal workers' demands, as presented in government-sponsored newspaper advertisements, are taken out of context. "Some of the demands seem, on the surface, to be pretty outrageous," he explained.

Hackett also commented on "media myths and their effect on public perception," with what he believes to be undue emphasis on the wage issue. He saw this as a government attempt to "divide and rule (by) playing off different groups in society. The government and media tend to present the public interest and trade unionism as two separate things, and even as antagonistic," he added.

Baxter suggested the government is "whipping up public sentiment and hysteria" as a device to win popular support and create credibility for the Liberal party.

According to Baxter, these issues are important to Queen's students, partly because they affect the general unemployment issue. For example, he explained, many of the postal union's wage demands are designed to pressure for a shorter work week for each employee, and a consequent increase in the total number of people employed.

But Baxter also sees the issue as one of democratic social rights. "What happens to them (the Postal Workers Union) shouldn't happen to anybody I see it as something that affects everyone in society," he said.

Shopping in Kingston

by Phil McGuire

The best one can hope for when food shopping is, if not to find low prices, to at least find the lowest prices. While you can no longer buy hamburger at fifty cents a pound anywhere, there is enough variation in prices between stores that shopping around can make a significant difference in what you pay.

To help you decide where the most appealing prices, selection and atmosphere can be found in Kingston's food stores, a survey was conducted last week. Included were the six supermarkets in the city, and the corner stores immediately surrounding the campus. These were selected because they serve the majority of average students, i.e., those who live on or near campus, and rely on feet, bicycle or bus for transportation. If you have a car at your disposal, cheaper prices still can be obtained at the supermarkets just outside Kingston.

A limit was set on the number of small stores surveyed to allow a compilation of the information into a useful table. Some popular corner stores farther from campus had to be omitted for this reason.

The large stores and small ones cannot be directly compared. Obviously more turnover of stock allows the larger stores to buy more goods, and therefore benefit from package deals and bulk prices. This is reflected in cheaper prices on the shelves. More room to expand also allows them to stock a house brand and bargain brands in addition to the popular, more expensive brands.

Though the corner stores can not compare with the chain stores for low prices, they are indispensable.

Here are some highlights of the stores around town

by Phil McGuire

A number of stores offer special advantages not just related to price that are worth noting.

All supermarkets, except Cowan's, offer a delivery service to any address in the city, provided grocery shopping is finished by 4 o'clock. The cost is $1.50. In some cases, if you have a large load but do not live too far from the supermarket, it is cheaper to take a taxi.

Most of the major food stores advertise sales weekly in the Wednesday edition of the Whig-Standard. Some sale items are usually catchy, unnecessary goods, but fair reductions are offered on everyday items as well.

Both Dominion stores and Loblaw's offer a line of 'no-name' goods which are available at rock-bottom prices. These are staple goods of a quality that is generally indistinguishable from brand name items, that can really bring down the cost of weekly groceries. Unfortunately,

With the sporadic hours kept by most students at times of the year, it is not always possible to get out to the larger stores to shop regularly. The convenience and extended hours of the corner stores make them perfect for replenishing supplies between shoppings, popping out for a snack, or for laundry detergent.

Another advantage of the small store is personalized service. You may find that after a few trips to the local corner store, you are spending a few minutes to chat with the owner.

Owners of corner stores work hard for your business. Gus Poulos, owner of Andrea's Corner Store, puts in fifteen hours a day, seven days a week, and every five years he takes two weeks completely off. He has mixed feelings about the students that comprise most of his business.

"Some are good, and some are goats," he said.

Depending on how lazy you are, and how much you care about money, you may use the corner store for more. One thing to keep in mind though, is that while they are all more expensive than chain stores, the price difference between small stores can be drastic. A few more steps can save you a considerable amount.

Certain guidelines were followed in gathering price data. An attempt was made to find the lowest regular-priced brand available for each item surveyed. Sale prices were not included, because the time of surveying could favour one store over another.

Generic pricing rather than brand pricing, i.e. peas instead of Green Giant peas, was chosen because a better indication of the cheapest prices could be obtained. Not all stores carry the same brands, and open until 6 o'clock daily, including Sunday. The staff is friendly and helpful; the manager suggests open until 10 on Thursday and Friday. A butcher is not in on the first two nights of the week, however, so that not all meat cuts may be in stock.

Resembling a country general store, Cowan's Red and White offers the advantages of both the chain and corner stores. All surveyed items were stocked and, while the selection is limited, the compactness of the store makes shopping very fast. It is frequently the large name brands are pegged at the same price in different stores. It is on the house or economy brands that savings can be made by choosing one store over another. Unfortunately, there is no generic cereal.

Even students have minimum standards which must be met, and this had to be taken into account for certain products. Therefore, some 'brand X' items were passed up for the next highest priced brand of the same goods. Where this has been done, and where a cheaper price can be obtained by buying a larger size, the prices are marked with an asterisk. Generally, sizes suitable for two people were priced; larger sizes of non-perishable goods were priced.

This was not intended to be a comprehensive survey. The guideline was to include staple unprocessed foods and household and cleaning supplies. However, there are a few venerable stand-bys which had to be priced, such as macaroni dinner, cheese spread and slices, and hamburger dinner (Obvious brand names have been avoided, because there are cheaper ones).

Following are some highlights of each of the stores surveyed. A handy conversion table has been drawn up, which will facilitate price comparisons between two quantities of the same item. In other words, when you are staring at a basket of apples and a bag of them selling by the pound on the same shelf, and you are wondering which is cheaper, you can use this. If the conversion you want is not here, make your own in the store - you can always say you are doing a price survey!

Both Andrea's and Freddie's stay open until 12:00 every night in the week. They are the only stores in the area that do so, so when the late-night snack syndrome over comes you, be sure to head to the right place. Andrea's, which has a little restaurant attached, serves morning breakfast specials as early as 7:00 a.m.

Here is a helpful conversion table: Tomatoes: 4 small = 12 to 16 ozs. Green peppers: 2 large = 10 oz. Carrots: 2 bunches = 2 1/2 lbs. Mushrooms: 1 pint = 4 to 6 ozs.

Our liberalism is questioned

Battered Wives ban: for protection?

The Editor

I was somewhat shocked to read in the Tuesday, October 24th Queen's Journal about the effort of the National Union of Students to deny bookings to a "new wave" band I have no idea what a "new wave" band is, or for that matter what the "old wave" was, but I know "black listing" when I see it.

A university, if no where else, has among its multiple functions one that is often highly proclaimed that of a forum. A forum for ideas no matter how extreme. A place where one may encounter foreign ideas, examine them, argue them, love them or hate them, but at least be exposed to them.

It was not so many years ago that Queen's was a centre of controversy when an invited speaker was denied entry to Canada, not because of his eminent scientific qualifications, but because of his political affiliations. The Department of Immigration, rightly so, became the target of heated criticism.

The N.U.S., never number one in the conservative Queen's hit parade, now seems to be showing their own reactionary slip in their recent directive.

Will we, in the future, as Carleton seems to have in this case, be forced to knuckle down to a party line? Will we be denied the opportunity to see for ourselves, to decide for ourselves, as individuals?

The most potent moral force in this world, is a force consisting of moral individuals. Being "moral" by default seems such a weak alternative, antithetical to an institution of higher learning.

Battered wives or battered morals?

An obvious parallel is the banning of the film "Pretty Baby" from Ontario. A rather vacuous piece that would probably have disappeared two weeks after opening in all but a few "art theatres", it nonetheless deserved to be seen and heard. It dealt with important ideas, distasteful ideas, but relevant today, no matter how poor the artistic vehicle.

I cannot help but think that we are entering into a new era of repression of ideas - "protection" of society from seeing its own dark belly until it is too late. With Frank Drea on the back page banning nature and the N.U.S. banning "art" on the front page, we are indeed facing stormy times ahead. We can't stop Noranda, but watch out Punk Rock. Your sincerely

Stephen McNevin

"This is a hoax and a lie"

The Editor:

I write this in protest against an article appearing in last Wednesday's Journal entitled 'G.W. peeved over Urinal' which attempted to prove that G.W. staff did not actually write the Urinal.

It is obvious on reading the Urinal that the article is a farce, though not particularly amusing, as a few of Golden Words articles are. But while I am willing to take that kind of crap from a trashy newspaper such as G.W., this style of reporting offends my sense of truth as well as being belittling to you.

I therefore demand an apology for myself and for the student body which you have willfully misled, and a guarantee that all future features of the sort will be preceded by the citation 'This is a hoax and a lie'!

Student government in trouble

The Editor:

Generally I don't bother responding to the statements and actions ascribed to the present Alma Mater Society executive. However, two items in Friday's issue of the Journal cannot be allowed to pass without comment.

On page five of that issue ("Six groups move in"), John Koopman, Vice-President (Operations) of the AMS, is quoted as saying that "we accepted A.S.U.S. with the stipulation that they use the Centre as their head office". While not disputing Mr Koopman's words as far as they go, I would like to point out that they do not go nearly far enough.

After initial inquiries from A.S.U.S. in the spring of this year, the AMS has been desperately trying to get this Society into the John Deutsch University Centre for at least five months. In that period the A.S.U.S. executive, on at least three occasions, has made it quite clear to Mr Koopman that either the office space, or the conditions of occupancy were simply unacceptable to us. It has only been on the basis of special appeals from Mr. Koopman himself that we have reopened the issue. Mr. Koopman's words imply that we have been imploring the AMS to let us into the Centre. Nothing could be further from the truth. It was not until the office and the conditions of occupancy were acceptable to the A.S.U.S. Executive that the move was approved. As for Mr. Koopman's so called "stipulation", he has neatly demolished a straw man of his own creation.

A far larger area of concern is the Q.E.A.'s production of the Elvis Costello concert. Over ten days ago Great Canadian Rock Tours approached A.S.U.S. regarding the sponsoring of this event. The profits were to be transferred directly to the costs of producing the A.S.U.S. Lictor - in other words, directly to students. The AMS refused to grant us permission to use the lock Harty Arena. Their reason was that Q.E.A. was too busy or uninterested in the concert, but since Q.E.A. was the only organization allowed to bring groups onto campus, the concert still couldn't be put on. Now, apparently, Q.E.A. and the AMS have found it in their hearts (and their busy schedules) to bring in Elvis Costello!! How kind of them. Unfortunately there is no mention of the highly effective monopoly which keeps a stranglehold on concerts on this campus and denies to others the possibility of running such events.

If these are typical examples of the typical way the present AMS executive conducts its business then student government at this University is in very real trouble.

Yours sincerely,
Ross Bartlett, President
Arts and Science Undergraduate Society

"Let them eat cake" attitude hard to stomach says Kraft dinner diner

The editor,
This is a copy of a letter I've mailed to the National Chairman of the Queen's University Parents Association, requesting funds for Queen's Quest. This is the third time I've been bothered by the Quest and, frankly, I've had enough.

Sir:
Once again I have received a letter from you asking for funds. This was a surprise, since after my letter of December 13, 1977, I was assured that I would be bothered no longer by such communication by none other than Mr. J. M. Courtright, Vice-Principal, Development and Information, Queen's University. It would appear that your internal administration is less than efficient. You have spent 24 cents of the Quest's hard-earned (?) money on unnecessary, even offensive mail - not to mention the printing costs of the material which came along in the same envelope. Furthermore, the addresses on the letters are incorrect. The letters were addressed to our parents by name, but to us by address. It is a wonder that your organization doesn't spend more on administrative errors than it receives in donations!

As to the purpose of your venerable cause perhaps you could make it possible for some of our students to live like human beings throughout the year. I am not the product of financially well-off parents and therefore am dependent on loans from the government. But did you offer me any aid? I must answer regretfully in the negative.

Rather than "hit" us for more funds it would be better if you fought the government for 100% sponsorship - but that would quite possibly mean higher taxes for you, wouldn't it?

I feel that it is improper - no, downright immoral - to ask a student to pay close to, or over $800 a year (not to mention food, rent, etc.) to attend university. The student already donates a rather extensive part of his life to the society by conducting such extensive studies as here at Queen's. I myself have possibly more than a decade of such studies in front of me before I receive the amount of knowledge necessary to aid this ailing society we now live in. I may not make it. The financial resources just might not be there. So I ask that all students be allowed to go to university without having to pay a penny for tuition.

Is it socialistic to ask this? Probably, and those who have a higher income would certainly be opposed to it. It would mean no Cadillacs and Buicks to drive, no sailboats and all such other luxuries that those of your stature would possibly have a hard time doing without. Myself, I would be content having more than just "Kraft dinner" to eat. But I can also afford the occasional cup of coffee, and I guess you would call that luxury. Once I had a hard time understanding why Marie-Antoinette said "let them eat cake" on the eve of the French revolution, but with attitudes like yours to contend with, the meaning is becoming clearer and clearer.

secondary institutions should be 100% gov't sponsored. As you are probably aware, there exist countries today that have such a system. I hate to mention this - but I know that countries behind the Iron Curtain have such a system. Couldn't we, here in democratic (?) Canada, overcome our phobia of the word "communism" for just a moment and take from them concepts beneficial to us and leave those which are not? But I suppose that that would take a great deal of courage and, I must confess, your approaches leave me rather less than confident in your interpretation of such political courage.

In closing, I would like to present a challenge to you. a) form a political lobby within the concept of federal gov't (since provincial legislation would only affect this part of society, i.e. in Ontario), b) work out a feasible financial arrangement for 100% support of universities, colleges, etc., c) present this in a legitimate form of legislation in the federal parliament, and so d) do something more active than requesting (would begging be a justified term?) funds to justify, in my opinion, your existence within this society and being a member thereof. You'd better believe that I'm Sincerely yours,

by Peter Freedman

Peter Freedman is on his way to Israel and will be contributing intermittently throughout the year. In this issue he gives his impression of life in the heart of divided Ulster.

While on the way to Israel, I stopped for a time in the British Isles, and have just concluded a five day jaunt to Belfast, Northern Ireland. My host there was a law student at a place called Queen's University. This Queen's, established in 1845, was created under the same program as Queen's Kingston, although not originally run by the Presbyterian Church.

Queen's Belfast has a main campus located in the centre of town and several other divisions spread out over the city which house various faculties in their own facilities. The main campus is small in total area compared to Queen's Kingston, but is laid out to allow for large gardens and grassy spaces.

While it is not overbearing, security on campus reflects the political conditions in the province. Security guards are present at the entrances to some of the more sensitive buildings such as the bank, the campus store and the library. In the library no purses, briefcases, or other bags are allowed beyond the entrance. I had to get special permission to take a camera upstairs in order to photograph the university.

As a result of the restrictions and the general paranoia created by the years of violence, students tend to carry their books in the open. Carrying a side satchel, I noticed the glare of several sets of suspicious eyes.

Another difference at Queen's Belfast, also created by the political situation, is a greater degree of political activism in the student body in general, and to a much greater extent, within the student government. As my host was a member of the executive body, I had ample opportunity to stroll down the corridors of power and observe a group of people who were not in the slightest interested in student government, but were there to further the strength of other political organizations they represented and often headed. The external affairs department of the body did not deal with other universities, but with other countries. The positions are extreme, and the divisions bitter, and in this way, the university reflects Belfast itself.

The degree to which sectarianism governs the city and divides it, is astonishing. I was taken on speedy car rides down the Shankill Rd., the Falls Road, the Ardoyne, Andersonstown, and several other "no-go" areas. My host and driver totally ignored traffic signals or signs in these areas. A native of Belfast, he explained that often it was more dangerous to stop, than to run a red light.

The destruction in these areas is massive. Throughout Belfast, one sees buildings and entire streets where the windows and doorways have been sealed with bricks and mortar. Sometimes there is visible evidence of bomb damage, but often residents have been forced to leave solely by threats or their proximity to the violence. Whatever the individual reasons, large areas of the city have become uninhabitable. In the worst areas, bulldozers have levelled all structures and just paved over the neighbourhood.

During these Formula 1 - style rides, my host, Rowel, continuously pointed here and there, saying, "This road here marks the boundary. It's all Catholic for the next five blocks." or "This street used to be mixed, but the Catholics were forced out and moved to south Belfast." or "This area is a big Protestant Unionist stronghold, you can see the Unionist signs on the wall."

Once in a while, we would pass a street whose entrance was blocked by barbed wire, and a huge steel gate. This signified a Catholic street in a Protestant area or vice versa.

The pubs in the trouble areas were often closed down or bombed out, but those surviving were, like the aforementioned street, surrounded by barbed wire and steel gates.

The downtown section of Belfast is closed off at all entrance points by military checkpoints, where everybody entering is physically searched. Other military and police checkpoints are to be found at the airport and at random locations throughout the city. In addition, police armoured vans patrol the streets with sub-machine guns sticking out the back. At night helicopters with powerful searchlights keep watch.

And yet, life goes on in the city and in the university. Hundreds of thousands of people adopt their lives to circumvent the trouble, and perhaps that's part of the problem.

Queen's Belfast has a fine academic reputation in Great Britain, known for an especially good medical school. Until I met him, the President of the student government was unaware of Queen's Kingston. After a short discussion, he expressed a desire to communicate with the A.M.S. and so Dave Brown might expect a letter in the near future.

So much for Belfast. Next stop - Haifa.

Please wink deliciously

by Julia Gruneau

with thanks to P.J., M.Z. and P.B.

About winking: it's time that it stopped being the prerogative of lovers and began establishing itself as the best non-physical form of communication.

Winking is non-denominational. Winks carry as far as the eye can see and as far as one can see the eye. Anybody can wink with practice. It is the diversion of the rich and the sport of the poor; it causeth hearts to flutter and perspiration to flow freely, it is a sign of camaraderie and friendship that does not need words.

Winks are the beloved of conspirators, for they leteth people in on the joke. They are cherished by cliques, societies, faculties, roommates, floormates, and people who are in the same major as you are. Giving a wink is delicious because it is unusual and intimate and daring, receiving one causes sudden indrawn breaths, smiles, blushes, or (best of all and terribly exciting) a wink returned.

It would be a very wise move for young men to take up winking at unattached female friends, winking is the best endearing legal way to meet them that exists. And it is well known that a wink from a female to a male, if properly timed and executed, causes blurred vision, weak knees, and occasionally heart attacks.

Please wink. Winking thrills and excites, but takes the sting out of scraped elbows and insults. Winking can cause falls from great heights and enables one to ascend from the depths. Remember "Weeping may endure for a night, but winks cometh in the morning."

Trudeau's demise a media concoction

by Drew Fagan

From the day he took over the reins of government, in the illustrative eyes of one commentator "like a stone through a stained-glass window," Pierre Trudeau has been the subject of a curious love-hate relationship on the part of the media and the Canadian public. The reporters who created the Trudeau image that propelled him to the leadership of the Liberal Party and subsequently, to victory in the 1968 election were the journalists who formulated the 1972 image of a Prime Minister revelling in the corridors of power to the degree expected of a 17th century sun king. Each artificially created image suited the interests of the creators and, as such, had an extraordinary effect on the way in which Trudeau was seen in the eyes of the nation.

In the same manner that the media overemphasized the low esteem for which the Liberals and Trudeau were held in 1976, journalists everywhere have gone out of their way to prove that the latest by-elections show unequivocally that the Liberals are doomed for defeat, a full six months or more before the coming general election. To place such certainty on the outcome of such an event, particularly on the basis of 15 by-elections, demonstrates the media lacks any degree of perspective.

By-elections have traditionally been an opportunity for the electorate to express its distaste of government policy, without actually having to concern itself with the possible consequences of toppling the party in power. In the United States, where congressional elections are permanently scheduled for the middle year of the Presidential term of office, the party without representation in the White House has, with very few exceptions, made gains in support. To the voters this is not so much a serious rebuke of the government, as it is an effort to better balance the forces of power, to show the leaders that they had better more closely watch and initiate policy based on the views of the populace. In Canada, despite the serious state of the economy, little credence can be made of the mass media's assumptions that the by-elections show an electorate with a frozen hostility towards Trudeau and his party.

The journalist's conviction that the polls prove a long-term personal dislike of the Prime Minister and an inaffinity with his handling of the government's affairs, flies in the face of recent history. Since the 1974 election, the Liberals have seen their popular support in national polls fall to 26% in October 1976 and watched it rise with the election of the Parti Quebecois to a high of 51% in mid 1977. Since that time, the electorate has shown an astounding degree of indecision as polls have fluctuated widely. There is, thus, no reason to assume that the Liberals are beyond hope. Trends towards economic recovery will bring the electorate back to the Liberal fold just as the separatist crisis led to massive Liberal support throughout 1977.

The by-election results can be viewed as an anti-Liberal vote, a sentiment against the Government, from which the P.C.'s were able to benefit. The general election will afford the P.C.'s no such opportunity. Voters cannot use their ballots merely to slap the Liberals but must use them in a responsible manner in electing a Government. The P.C.'s must stand on much more than the substantial anti-Liberal sentiment throughout the country. They must be capable of presenting themselves as an alternative Government and they have to a sizable degree been unable to achieve this objective. Voters will be much more wary of supporting the P.C.'s in the general election when the opportunity is actually there for them to form a government.

Journalists have always been fascinated with the Prime Minister and as such, have tended to overemphasize the importance of events that surround him, in this case extrapolating a long-term significance from these by-elections. In fact, for better or worse, Mr. Trudeau is a long distance from certain defeat in the coming election.

Week of awakening to waning of wisdom

by Sandi Blair and Mary-Joy Aitken

The quality of education at Ontario's post-secondary institutions is declining, and it appears that it is going to suffer further deterioration. This is partly due to decreased transfer program payments (a decrease of $220 million for education and health care) from the federal to the provincial governments, but more significantly, from the decision of the Ontario government to balance its budget by the early 1980's. Reflecting this decision education's portion of the total budget has declined from 11.3% in 1972-73 to 9.1% in 1978-79. Even more significant, is the increase in operating grants to universities of only 5.8%. With inflation running at 8.15%, the effect is a decline in the real dollar funding to universities. This means the expenditure per student in Ontario has fallen from the highest in Canada in 1967, to eighth in 1976-77. The net effect of inadequate funding is clear: costs cannot be covered and thus cutbacks at the university level must be made.

We are living in an economic recession, and thus solutions to the issue of cutbacks in educational funding are not simple. However, the current government policy of arbitrarily cutting, not only educational, but also, health-care, daycare, UIC etc., funding, is not the proper solution. It seems government cutting occurs where there will be the least political response. This strategy hurts those who can least afford it - lower income families.

Underfunding our universities not only results in a deterioration in the quality of our education, but in reduced accessibility as well. Only 14% of students attending post-secondary institutions come from families earning less than $10,000 per year. Meanwhile OSAP applications are down significantly; here at Queen's, OSAP applications have fallen 25.7% over last year.

Why should such a drop occur when there is such an obvious need for a student aid program in times of economic crisis? There are several reasons. Parental contribution; for example, now begins at the $6,600 income level, as opposed to the $7,600 level of last year. Students are now ineligible for grants after four years of university (this affects 10-15,000 students). OSAP expects a summer contribution of at least $800. Job-wise, 15.3% of students were unemployed this summer as compared to a national unemployment rate of 9%. Student wages are falling - Experience '78 was paying 28% less than last year. At the same time Unemployment Insurance cuts mean more students will be ineligible for unemployment benefits.

Here at Queen's, Cutbacks Week, an opportunity for everyone to become aware of the issues and to help fight this deterioration is being held from October 30 to November 3.

TENURE

by Ross Bartlett
Beth McKenzie

This fall the Senate Committee of Appointment, Promotion, Tenure and Leave (SCAPT) will present to the Senate for approval or rejection, documents which will govern the tenuring of faculty at Queen's University.

The following article is an attempt to bring to students some of the facts and ideas regarding this highly complex issue. What we hope to do is bring to the attention of Queen's students some of the ramifications regarding an issue which affects us all directly, and provoke some deep thought and serious reflection on the part of all members of the University community.

An indication of the complexity of the tenure issue is the difficulty of getting a real definition of tenure itself. A pretty basic request you'd think - a simple definition of a word. The trouble is that tenure is a concept as well and a concept closely tied to the concept of the purpose of a University.

The extreme views of the issue show a marked lack of sensitivity for the complexity of the question. To call tenure "absolute job security", an "anachronistic impediment to financial responsibility", as a "cover-up for incompetence" is to beg investigation of the matter.

Tenure was originally developed to protect those who engaged in research and social criticism. It gave a defence in the search for knowledge and truth, allowing dissent without dismissal or censure from those who might find the truth uncomfortable. It protected those who would observe and criticize society without fear of recriminations from an irate state.

It still does that, although extreme criticisms are becoming more widespread as tenure is defined as job security and it is pointed out that in any university there are any number of less than competent individuals who cannot be dismissed because at one point in their careers they were deemed worthy of tenure.

The question still remains - can the tenure system be refined in such a way as to protect all academics (not just those officially "tenured") and still allow for the elimination of the deadwood?

Tenure has had a very uneven history. When universities were prepared to try and protect their tenured staff, and when the state was not ready to push too hard, then professors were fairly safe.

If, on the other hand, universities were not ready or able to vigorously defend their traditional freedoms and the state was ready to go to great lengths to silence critics, tenure was very little protection.

The "Statement on Academic Freedom and Tenure" was adopted by the Senate of Queen's University in April 1969, and it is the system under which Queen's currently operates in these matters.

It states, among other things in its preamble, that "Queen's University recognizes academic freedom as indispensable to the purpose of a university", and that, "freedom of a faculty member to study, to teach and to record knowledge according to his best professional judgement is a prerequisite for a university to fulfill its role in society." The principal mechanism for securing this freedom has been the granting of tenure.

The same document called for tenure requests to be evaluated by the Head of the department after "close and deliberate consultation with a representative group of colleagues and students". This appraisal was to take into "careful account" the candidate's teaching performance, with an indication of the evidence upon which it is based.

Interestingly enough, of the written evidence required for each decision on tenure, none of it had to be from a student.

Appointments were to be probationary at the outset to allow time to evaluate persons who would eventually be applying for tenure. While appointment did "not imply inevitable appointment with tenure" in a significant number of cases, especially in a period of high mobility such as the 1960's it amounted to the same thing. Significantly, the 1969 "Statement" called for faculty members to strive for, intellectual vitality, effective participation in the work of the faculty or department and regular access for students.

Once a person has tenure, how do you get rid of them? To put it less bluntly, suppose a member of the faculty has not lived up to the high promise he showed as a teacher or researcher at the time of his appointment.

In most fields and professions incompetence or inability can be dealt with in prescribed fashions. Does the tenured professor face any such possibility? A professor "shall not be dismissed before retirement age, except for adequate cause". Adequate cause, the regulations define as a persistent neglect of duty, refusal to carry out reasonable assignments or gross misconduct which unfits a person to continue as a member of faculty.

The grounds for dismissal must be virtually air-tight because a dismissal may devalue into something closely resembling a legal trial - complete with counsel. Under such circumstances, "adequate cause" is very difficult to prove and since failure to prove to court's satisfaction might lead to legal suits on grounds of unjust dismissal, character defamation and so on.

In a sense this might be very good. A serious threat would be posed to the free enquiry mentioned above if dismissal was too easy to get.

On the other hand it can be argued that in an institution dedicated to higher learning and the pursuit of excellence, is even the slightest incompetence (especially where it significantly affects the quality of the university community) acceptable?

The difficulty with the 1969 "Statement on Freedom" was that it laid down no precise criterion for evaluation. As a report of the A.M.S. Policy Advisory Committee in 1975 posed the matter: "How well is a faculty member protected from questionable or vague criterion being used to make hard decisions" on the granting of tenure or on dismissal? Does this system really protect the individual or does it simply open the door to the repressive reprisals it seeks to avoid?

Even if one cannot give too much credence to "horror stories" of academic repression, these questions do cast serious doubts on the cast-iron nature of this defence of academic freedom.

What is of increasing concern is lack of defence for teaching effectiveness in the university. As the A.M.S. report noted, "in the extreme cases, Classics, English, History, Philosophy, Chemistry, entire faculties of Law, Applied Science, Education, most medical departments, tenure has been granted so widely that there is no means of dealing with shifts in interest or social needs (p. 4-5).

This gives too little credit to the adaptive abilities of members of the faculty in these areas but the fact remains that in all but one of nine faculties and schools surveyed by the office of the Vice Principal (Finance) in August 1977, over 50% of the staff were tenured and in five of these areas, over 75% were tenured or probationary.

Applied Science, Law and Urban and Regional Planning logged in at 90% or more with Arts and Science (by far the largest single faculty) not far behind with 79.5% of staff in a tenured or probationary position. This translates into a large group of virtually irremovable staff.

In the spring the SCAPT finally brought forward working papers on the new regulations for tenure to meet the needs of the end of the 20th century. This is the result of two years of intense work by this group. The working papers were subjected to intense observation and discussion all through the spring and will take their final form in regulations to be received at the November meeting of Senate.

The question of student membership on tenure committees was discussed in these working papers. Although SCAPT took the position that students should have a voice in the assessment of a candidate, they did not define how great a role this voice would play in the final decision.

The Departmental Committees for Tenure assess candidates on their contributions and abilities in three areas: 1) research and scholarship, 2) Participation in the work of the university, and 3) Teaching. Although the tenured members of committees certainly have knowledge of all three areas, students can provide valuable opinions and insight as to the effectiveness of a candidate's teaching, for they are made aware of it daily.

As staff are probably more aware of a candidate's research and administrative contributions, the presence of a student would ensure that the candidate's abilities in all three areas are represented equally, and given equal weight in the final decision.

Student input can also make staff aware of shifting patterns of interest within the department, so that the candidates may be viewed with the future needs of the department in mind.

SCAPT also questioned the ability of students to appraise a candidate's academic work. However, seeing as many of the works published by scholars today are used in textbooks and reference books used by students, students should have a voice in assessing the scholastic and instructional merits of a candidate's work. The students on Departmental Committees for Tenure should have been chosen for their interests in the field of study, just as are the other members of the committee.

Their function would be the same as that of the other members - to provide a broad range of pertinent information about the all-around abilities of the candidate, so that the committee as a whole can make a refined and informed judgement.

Students can provide information about facets of the candidate which staff might not have the opportunity to see, definitely broadening the range of information available.

It was also suggested in the papers that "The inclusion of students might be inhibiting, in that committee members might be reluctant to state their opinions frankly." However, as the student body will be very directly affected by the types of candidates receiving tenure, it is not important that they be aware of (all) pertinent facts about the candidates' qualifications?

On committees, it is important that all members be equal, and all opinions be given equal weight if the committee system is to fulfil its purpose. Students as well as staff are capable of making responsible judgements.

In fact, here at Queen's students have proven their competence in handling responsible positions in university affairs. The role of students on committees for the selection of Principals, Deans and Department Heads is already well established, as is the position of Rector.

If it is accepted that students do have a valuable contribution to make on matters concerning tenure, it is important to ensure that the input which they contribute is heeded. The only way to ensure this is to have mandatory student representation on Departmental Committees for Tenure whenever practical.

At MacMaster University, the Senate Committee recently ended a ten year tradition of student participation on tenure committees. R.C. McIvor, Dean of Social Sciences and chairman of that faculty's Tenure and Promotion Committee, made this statement, "We realize that student input is valuable, but the question is whether it is effective." Can input and advice ever be truly effective on their own, or must they be enforced by the power of a vote?

If there was ever a time when student participation in tenure decisions was vital, it is now, for with today's decreasing enrolment and decreasing funding of universities, fewer staff are being taken on. However, the number of candidates for these positions is increasing due to the unemployment situation in Canada.

Consequently, it is important to ensure that those who receive tenure are of the highest all-around calibre and the presence of students on tenure committees can help to achieve this goal.

Does tenure reinforce the insulation of professors in the ivory tower?

Rocker Bradstreet shocks folkies

by Bruce Stratton

David Bradstreet fought an iceberg last Sunday and the iceberg won. The scene of the confrontation was Grant Hall. The iceberg was made up of various and sundry Kingston folk music aficionados. Mr. Bradstreet waged war with an electric guitar and a five man back-up band. The iceberg was unimpressed.

Bradstreet first shocked the audience by appearing clean-shaven and sporting a New Wave style black T-shirt. He then proceeded to further discomfort what he termed the "folk purists" by playing some heads-up here-I-come rock and roll.

In an interview after the show Bradstreet appeared to be in buoyant spirits, elated with his new-born son and life in general. He claimed that Van Morrison and his "acoustic rock" style was the influence which caused him to move towards this style of music. And indeed, "Distant Field", which featured an acoustic guitar over a rock and roll back-up was one of the concert's highlights.

The popular favourites were also played. Although Bradstreet confessed to being nervous about playing songs such as "Blues as Like Shoes" because he had recently been concentrating more on his rock, he had no difficulty at all in getting Grant Hall swaying to the older numbers.

Perhaps next year we'll be better prepared to accept a rock and roll David Bradstreet. He certainly deserves the chance.

Woods

Rob Young opened the show and although he appeared ill at ease with such a large crowd, he performed brilliantly.

Bradstreet failed to warm the Grant Hall audience despite a good show

Elvis: New Wave rolls to Kingston

by Frank Mulock

ELVIS COSTELLO AND THE ATTRAXIONS are in concert Saturday, November 4, at Jock Hardy Arena.

The Kingston date is the second of Elvis's WAKE UP CANADA tour that kicks off Friday night in Toronto. THE BATTERED WIVES, the back-up band on the tour's other 10 Canadian dates will not be putting in an appearance here. Apparently certain campus groups have deemed the band's name offensive and have therefore decided that it would be in the campus's best interests that the WIVES not perform. Instead we are to be subjected to GODDO, a Canadian power trio. yawn - Oh excuse me, back to our story.

A brief history: Elvis Costello was born Declan Patrick McManus 23 years ago in Liverpool. Rumour has it that he changed his name in honour of his 2 heroes - Elvis Presley and Lou Costello. If you are interested, Elvis is married and has a 3 year old son.

Until 18 months ago Elvis worked as a computer operator for ELIZABETH ARDEN COSMETIX. He secured a record contract by inflicting himself upon a Columbia Records convention. Elvis stood at the door of the convention hall, amp strapped to his shoulder, strumming away. The president happened by and Elvis got a contract.

Since then he has released 2 albums. "My Aim Is True" became the first New Wave release to break into the U.S. Top 50. "This Year's Model" has easily eclipsed the first album's success.

Elvis's sound: Elvis is one of the few real talents to be washed up by the New Wave. He is not a punk - he's too talented. His music is very melodic, rooted in post pub-rock rhythm blues. Basically it's killer rock n' roll.

Elvis's lyrics attract a lot of attention. In Costello's words, "The only 2 things that matter to me, the only motivating points for writing the songs, are revenge and guilt." Costello is always out in the cold, the victim of sexual warfare. His songs recount his amorous encounters and inevitable failures. "Sometimes I think that love is just a tumour - you've got to cut it out." "Contempt for the fair sex reigns supreme." "See her picture in a 1,000 places coz she's this year's girl, you see yourself rollin' on the carpet with this year's girl."

Many critics have compared Costello to the likes of Dylan and Springsteen. In a recent trade magazine interview Elvis spoke about his music and the comparisons especially to Springsteen.

"Springsteen's always romanticizing the 1. street, I'm bored with people who romanticize the 1. street. The Street isn't 1. attractive! The songs are the most important thing I want the songs to mean something to people, too much music has cut itself off from people. It's become like the ballet or something. Ballet is only for people who can afford to go and see it. You don't get ballet going on in your local pub. You can't cover up songs by bringing in synthesizers and choirs of angels. They have to stand on their own. Songs are just so 1. effective. People seem to have forgotten that. I don't want any of that rock n' roll rubbish. I don't want to go cruisin' through Hollywood and hang out at all the parties. It's the arse end of rock n' roll. I'd rather kill myself than be around to witness my artistic decline!"

The final word goes to a Columbia Records promotion man. "We seem to have succeeded in creating a kind of mystique about Elvis and he seems to respond to audience response. At

"I don't want that rock n' roll rubbish". His best shows he tends to taunt and incite them. He can be kind of pleasantly antagonistic."

I Musici gel magically after shakey opening

by Julian Cunningham

I Musici di Roma, the twelve member chamber orchestra which has gained international renown as a preserver of Italian music of the Baroque era, was in no rush to demonstrate the essence of its fame last Saturday night, before a capacity audience at Grant Hall.

In works by Corelli, Albinoni and Bottesini, the orchestra were little more than technically precise and expressively uninspired.

The Concerto Grosso in D major was their first offering. And under the almost indiscernible direction of Pina Carmirelli, I Musici ("the musicians") gave a very competent rendition of the Corelli piece. Most notable perhaps, were the lovely canonic and fuguing strains involving the two first violins. Otherwise, the performance was exact, but spiritless.

Albinoni's Sonata in G Minor found the group somewhat more lively. Each discord in the Adagio section was extended and held slightly before its resolution, giving a lyrical and yearning tone to the music. Viola work was the strength of this piece. They were solid, rich and supportive to the rest of the group, who were still somewhat hesitant and disunified.

Bottesini's Gran Duo Concertante for Violin, Doublebass and Strings, rounding out the first half of the programme, was a showcase for virtuoso playing.

This early work of Bottesini is laden with ornate arpeggio, cadenza and recitative sections. Both the violinist and the bassist showed amazing dexterity and musicianship in their playing. Unfortunately, the work does not transcend the quality of insipid drawing room music; a cramming of quaint little tunes interspersed with incredibly complex soli passages. By the intermission, I was honestly asking myself what all the 'hoo-hah' made about this group meant. My questions were given stiff reply in the second half of the programme.

Vivaldi's ever popular Four Seasons was featured for the last hour. And finally we saw the synthesis of brilliant music, technical perfection and inspired ensemble playing that we had been anticipating all night.

"Spring", the opening Concerto of the work, was like a fanfare. I Musici was now a unit playing out its heart in the music it loved.

"Summer" was a stage for continuo, with its beautiful syncopations and varied rhythms.

Vivaldi's true greatness as a writer in slow movements was evident in "Autumn." With simplicity and magic that bring J.S. Back to mind, the Adagio molto was utterly enchanting.

Miss Pina Carmirelli's playing gave the Vivaldi work its depth. Much older than most of her colleagues, she had twice the vitality. Her violin sang with joy, and dramatic inspiration. Her instrument looks more like another limb of her body, as she and the violin were truly a unity of mind and matter.

The end of the Vivaldi work was met with an extensive ovation from the enthralled audience. Miss Carmirelli was rightfully "bravo'd" many times.

I Musici is an organization for which we should be truly thankful. When they are inspired, they have no peer.

Drama guild programme

by Julian Cunningham

The Queen's Drama Guild is back again this year, once again offering interested students an opportunity to try their hand at just about any aspect of the theatrical spectrum.

Aspiring directors, actors, writers and technicians will be welcomed.

The Guild has also begun to organize workshops in mime, movement, jazz tap, and many other areas. These workshops will likely begin in early January.

The Little Prince, adapted from Antoine de Saint Exupery's charming little fairy tale for "the big people", is presently in production. The Guild is writing its own stage version of the piece, and while auditions have already concluded, those interested in assisting with the technical side of the show are urged to call director Sheila Power at 544-9379. The show will go up in January/79.

President Lyn Royce appears to be hot on the heels of last year's successes. This year, besides the poignant Little Prince, three other scripts are under consideration. These are: After the Rain (a three act play), and two one act shows, A Change, and A Bit of New Life.

There is a $2.00 membership fee, and anyone in the Queen's community is welcome to join. Their next general meeting will be held on Nov. 14th at 7:00 p.m., and anyone with any questions about the Guild should phone the president, Lyn Royce, 546-7505.

Thriller acceptable despite lacks

Lawrence Olivier well cast as Lieberman in "Boys from Brazil."

by Mark Henderson

The interest in fascism, both past and present, has increased dramatically in recent years, as it has finally become accepted that it isn't something rooted in history but a phenomenon that can occur anywhere and at any time. The latest expose of fascism is now available at your local Famous-Players theatre, a surprisingly intriguing sci-fi thriller called The Boys From Brazil. I say surprising, because big budget films which try to cash in on some facet of the public psyche are almost always bad, or just plain boring. This film has all the ingredients: a big name cast (Gregory Peck, James Mason and Laurence Olivier), massive financial backing ($12 million), and a fast paced plot that alternates between South America, the U.S., and Western Europe. Credit for pulling everything together must be given to director Franklin J. Schaffner, who skillfully generates a good amount of depth and suspense through his emphasis on atmosphere and character exploration.

The Boys From Brazil refers to 94 young boys cloned from the blood and skin of Adolph Hitler, and ingeniously distributed to foster families throughout the western world. Although a description of the plot would take too long, its mechanics are based upon the gathering of information by Jewish Nazi-hunter Ezra Lieberman, on the group of Nazis gathering in Paraguay to execute a plan for world domination. Laurence Olivier plays Lieberman, a tireless defender of divine justice, and his portrayal is excellent as always. Gregory Peck is strangely cast as Dr. Josef Mengele, an actual experimental surgeon who worked at Auschwitz during the war

It is a pivotal role in which all the evil of fascism is located, but Peck doesn't really give it the authenticity needed to make it believable. He tends to overact, and resorts to grandiose facial contortions in order to display the demented mind of Mengele. Lieberman and Mengele don't actually meet until the climax of the movie, and this awaited confrontation helps create the suspense in the story, as Lieberman discovers the plot to systematically murder the fathers of the Hitler clones on their 65th birthdays, an aspect of Hitler's childhood that must be duplicated. Scenes alternate between the Nazis setting their plan in motion and the hunt headed by Lieberman to stop it, allowing a multitude of characters to be introduced.

The Boys From Brazil isn't a consistently riveting film, as it gets off to a clumsy start. The introductory scenes of Paraguay are shallow and reek of latent racism on the part of the film makers. They do manage to create an atmosphere of suspended disbelief though, and the majority of the movie is well paced and exciting. The combined repulsion and attraction peculiar to fascism is perfectly crystallized in one of the last scenes in the film when young Hitler clone initiates the death of Mengele. He reacts to the blood, violence with a gloating pleasure which suddenly turns to revulsion not knowing how to respond to his own emotions. Ignoring the often patronizing morality of the movie

Wertmuller featured at NFT

by Mark Henderson

On this Friday, Saturday, and Sunday evenings the National Film Theatre presents three films from one of the most important and controversial film makers of the decade: Lina Wertmuller. Now an international figure, this Italian-born director burst upon North America's commercial scene in 1974 with Seven Beauties, a powerful tale combining the bizarre cruelty of a Nazi concentration camp, with an expose of male machismo and its obvious sexist overtones. Since then, all of her films have been widely shown, and the NFT has obtained three of her best, Swept Away, All Screwed Up, and Love and Anarchy. Giancarlo Giannini stars in two of these films and he has become somewhat of a cultish superstar. Under Wertmuller's skillful handling of his proud Italian masculinity, he is usually picked apart and ridiculed by the director's cutting humour and cynicism.

Lina Wertmuller began her career as an assistant to Federico Fellini. His taste for the scandalous and perverse has added to her own beliefs in social inequality on an individual and sexual level. By relating the specific to the general, she alternates between a blatant and subtle criticism of modern capitalist society, by revealing its manifestations in people's behaviour and moral standards. She tears away at this ideological mystification by introducing her characters in a humorous way, and gradually becoming quite serious and vicious in her attacks. Her ability to probe into the male psyche may be disturbing to some people, but her unique genius in doing so is irrefutable. An eye for the ugly and the beautiful existing side by side, as well as an amazing insight of the political significance of our values and mores, are only two of Wertmuller's directorial attributes. Her films tend to be relatively complex and her cinematic style and technique are certainly not a rehash of traditional film making. A frenzied editing style contrasts the exquisite use of composed tracking shots, so that an audience is not allowed to sit passively and absorb 2 or 3 hours of easily digestible entertainment. Viewer input is necessary to really appreciate Wertmuller's analysis of the human condition and the contradictions inherent in our trust of the political systems that govern over us. Her probing and cynical viewpoint may discourage a lazy or muddled mind. The myths of political stability and right to judge are challenged and destroyed, with humour being the primary weapon. Even in the context of the generally good selection offered by the NFT, Wertmuller's work should provide a refreshing change of pace, movies which can help us laugh at the weaknesses of people and society, and encourage the desire for change. The "battle of the sexes" has never been put in its political and cultural context so well and with such aesthetic grace, making this director one of the best talents to gain recognition in a long while.

Joslin Band at Grounds

by Elin Steele
Saturday night, Bitter Grounds had considerable competition from other Halloween celebrations. Although Clark Hall was certainly not packed to the ceiling, those who did come were treated to a fast-paced, foot-stompin' evening with the Bill Joslin Band.

The guest set was played by Andy Simon who brought his own guest the mysterious "Cathy" from Windsor who, after little rehearsal, complemented Simon very well in their performances of "Canadian High Wind" and an encore of "Helpless, Helpless" as well as her own version of Jowell George's "Willin". Simon also performed some of his own songs including "Just Once Be Sincere".

The Bill Joslin Band just kept the tunes coming with "Silver Threads", "Two More Bottles of Wine", the classic "Ashes of Love", "Carmelita" and "Wheels". It was not long before people began to take advantage of the open dance floor as the band played out songs by Jimmy Buffett, Buddy Holly and Hank Williams. During the third set, a spontaneous addition to the five man group was added for one tune in the form of Morris and his Harmonica.

Though the audience was small, it was certainly responsive to the music, the delicious homebaked goods, and the beer. Next week promises to be a great time with the Whilom Stringband Saturday and Sunday night.

Bill Joslin cranks it out. Hamel

Tamblyn well paced

by Colin Hunt

"Devian fun" was the phrase Ian Tamblyn used to describe his opening number "Bachelor's Weekend" at Scarecrow last Saturday night. It also serves as a good description of many of Tamblyn's other off-beat tunes which predominated the first set. Satire is a common element in some artists' music, but self-mocking is more rarely found. In a superb spoof of his old tune "Are You Sleeping Tonight With Your New Lover", Tamblyn pokes fun at both the over-sentimental nature of the original song and the desecrations of plagiarists who distort tunes to their own purposes in his slightly reworked version called "Are You Sleeping Tonight With Elwood Gower?"

The second set contained more serious material, highlighted by a long ballad on the piano called "The Brakeman" in which the influence of Tom Waits could be detected. This was followed by a song formed from two unfinished compositions.

The first part was Tamblyn's personal rewriting of the music score for the old Francois Truffaut film "The Madness of Adele H." and the second was simply called "Paris Afternoon". Tamblyn's skill with the piano was evident with the smooth blending of these two fragments without discontinuity. Tamblyn ended the evening with "I take the Blues on into the Night", which is as apt and fitting an end of a performance as Jackson Brown's well known hit "The Loadout".

The great set was performed by Roger James who supplemented his guitar and banjo with a variety of Kazzo, beepers and bells. James specializes in songs on the verge of extinction such as Groucho Marx's "Lydia, the Tattooed Lady", a little known Depression blues tune, and variations of Twenties and Thirties rags. More recent compositions were Tom Lehrer's satire on the nuclear arms race written in 1957 called "Who's Next" and a medley of James's own banjo tunes. The only discordant note in James's set was his excellent rendition of a ballad by Bif Rose called "Molly" which was too abruptly out of place in an otherwise comic repertoire.

It was an excellent night at Scarecrow marred only by Tamblyn's technical problems with his guitar. After breaking a string in the first set, he had difficulty keeping it in tune for the remainder of the evening. This particular evening at Scarecrow was otherwise a good blend of "devian fun" and smooth mellow ballads into a satisfying melange.

The band provided lots of "fast-paced, foot-stompin'" music for a small but lively audience. Hamel

Milliken, Busk exhibit adds warmth to colour

by Madeline Mills

The soft pale skin of a woman's feet, standing on brown granular sand, juxtaposed beside a man's sturdy leather boots under rugged leather jeans, is the image Bill Milliken calls the Engagement photo of him and his wife.

Milliken and Paul Busk's photographs are currently being shown at the Brock St. Gallery. Milliken, who studied at Waterloo, had been doing Queen's grad. photos and freelancing for Harrowsmith magazine before he became the assistant producer for Harrowsmith. Busk is a jeweller and a part time actor, who goes down South every year to do under-water photography.

Busk explained that the whole spectrum of warm colours is blotted out for the human eye at a fifty foot depth but with a flash they are visible in a photo. Most of his shots use this principle but in one image he purposely did not use a flash and the greens and blues of the 'underworld' create an almost abstract image.

Probably the most technically brilliant photo in the exhibit is Milliken's picture Eggs. Brown, green and white hens eggs are seen totally surrounded by a diffused light. Many people who attended the Opening on Oct. 17 were heard to say "I love those eggs."

Queen's JOURNAL*Sports*Overtime victory for Queen's

by Don MacKinnon

The Queen's Golden Gaels are proving that they are a team that never quits. For the third time this season they rallied from a half time deficit to score a vital victory Saturday afternoon's overtime victory of 17-13 over a battling Carleton Ravens squad permits the Gaels to advance to the Eastern Conference Championship.

The four hour game which left both teams physically and emotionally exhausted, was not decided until Ted Tyczka's second interception of the afternoon with only two seconds to play in the second overtime. Carleton's last desperate comeback attempt was snuffed out.

The game was an exciting, finger-nail-biting defensive struggle. For both team's offenses, the game was a chronicle of missed opportunities. A number of impressive Queen's drives ended pointless as a surprisingly strong Carleton defense stifled the Gaels. However, it was the better conditioned and bigger Gaels' defense that tipped the scales in Queen's favour.

Although it was the defense as a unit that held the Gaels in the game, it was under the direction of courageous Bob Mullen that the offense was finally able to score the winning points. Quarterback Mullen who was pounded into the ground repeatedly by the Carleton front five, refused to stay down, though he had to sit out most of the third quarter suffering from double vision. John Lynch took over the helm in that quarter, and as the fourth quarter opened, he passed to Dave Marinucci for the opening touchdown. Shortly after, Lynch was sacked by a Carleton defensive line. Helped off the field after reinjuring his bad knee, Lynch watched Mullen re-enter the game. By the final gun, Bob Mullen was visibly shaken by the battering he had received. Blood running down his arms and bruises covering his body, he left the field in a state of shock. His never-say-die performance exemplified the way both teams played on Saturday. For Carleton, who played inspired football, it must have been a bitter defeat.

Before the first quarter was over, Queen's had notched a 35 yard Blaine Shore field goal and a 26 yard Shore single. But the first quarter had also seen Carleton stop the frustrated Gaels on the one yard line. In the second quarter, that frustrated Gaels on the one yard line. In the second quarter, that frustration was compounded for the Gaels after the offense reached the Carleton 8 but again came away empty.

Midway through the second quarter, Mullen was rocked from behind by a charging Raven lineman, who jarred the ball loose. Carleton recovered on the Gaels' 40 and after a bad Queen's punt, they were in excellent field position for another try at a major score. Fred Pinnock carried the ball in from the 5 at 10:45 of the second quarter. The Ravens convert was blocked leaving Queen's down 6-4 at half time.

In the second half, punter Tim Wardrop gave way to Myles Pritchard. However on his second punt attempt the snap sailed over his head and the eventual desperation punt was blocked. Though the Carleton scrimmaged from the Gaels' 11 the defense held and the Ravens managed only a field goal at 11:11 of the third quarter.

The play of the defense seemed to lift the Gaels' offense and as the quarter drew to a close Lynch strung together some superb pass-and-run plays. Moving from his own 45, he hit both Manastersky and then Rob Miller running a deep post pattern. At 1:07 of the fourth quarter, Lynch passed to Marinucci in the endzone for a go-ahead touchdown. This missed convert left the score 10 to 9 for the Gaels.

Carleton's immediate comeback tied the score after four plays. The game went into overtime as the score remained 10 all.

Two ten minute halves constituted overtime. In overtime both team's defenses continued to impress, but it was the Gaels' defence that stole the momentum away from the underated Ravens' club.

Tim Wardrop's interception early in overtime boosted the Gaels. Although Carleton scored first with a 44 yard punt single at 6:07, the Gaels' offence, inspired by the play of the defence, finally started to wear down a weary opposition. On the ensuing play, Dave Marinucci exploded through the middle for a 75 yard touchdown only to have it called back on a clipping call. The drive ended in a 32 yard field goal attempt that went for a single point.

With only seconds remaining until halftime, Carleton got the ball on the Gaels' 27 after a bad punt resulted in a no-yards penalty. A 24 yard pass took the Ravens down to the 3. On second and goal from the one, the Carleton offence waved off the field goal unit and went for the touchdown. However, the Ravens were denied even a single point as the clock ran out on the play. Carleton's defence sagged after what was one of the biggest plays of the game for the Gaels.

Queen's received the kickoff to start the second overtime period, and marched downfield for a touchdown. Paul Shugart got behind the Ravens secondary for 33 yard completion. Marinucci and Manastersky, drove the ball along the ground for two first downs. From the 15, Mullen passed to Bob O'Doherty for the major score. Though the convert was missed the Gaels led 17 to 11.

Carleton was thwarted in its last two possessions by interceptions and a conceded safety touch, which sealed the Gaels' victory, by Ted Tyczka.

This Saturday, the Gaels face a very tough McGill Redmen team (45-20 victors over Bishop's) in the C championship game. Jim Rutka will likely start in that game at quarterback. The Gaels hope for solid fan support to help defeat the Redmen. Game time Saturday is 1:00 p.m. Tickets will once again be $1.50.

Tony Manastersky collecting part of his 102 yard total.

Rowers top Canadian finishers at Boston Regatta

In only their second year of competition, Queen's Rowing crews have proven that they can compete with the very best in North American Rowing.

Last weekend the team travelled to Boston to compete in the world's largest single day sporting event - The Head of the Charles Regatta. The Regatta annually draws the finest rowing crews in the United States and Canada, with some 4,500 competitors and over 80,000 spectators.

Over the 3 mile course, that winds through the city of Boston, the Women's Varsity 8 placed 19th in a field of 40. The crew consists of Nancy Woods, Jane Withey, Erica Geddes, Maura Clark, Janet Hooper, Diana Harris, Anne Merchant, J. Gayman, Marie Belanger, and coach John Armitage. The Men's Varsity 8 raced the course within 30 seconds of the eventual winner, Dartmouth, finishing 11th in a field of 40 boats Queen's emerged as the top Canadian crew as well as beating such perennial rowing powers as M.I.T., Purdue, Northeastern, Columbia and Cornell. Never has a Canadian crew finished so well in the elite division of this regatta. Competing for Men's Varsity were Simon Warner, Don Lindsay, Doug Hamilton, Rick Pearson, Hendrik Saaltink, Gary Davis, Mark Evans, Rob Little, Kevin Gordon and coach Ian McFarland.

This weekend 6 crews representing Queen's returned to St. Catharines as defending Champions of the Brock Invitational Regatta. This meet served as a warm-up for the Ontario University Championships next weekend, and a story will come later this week.

Saturday, November 4 is the Co-ed Volleyball tournament. Get your team together now. The entry deadline is on Tuesday, October 31 at 3:30pm. Hope to see you there!

University Invitational meet. In fact, the margin of victory over the perennial challenger Western this past weekend, was a mere two points. This win was recorded at the first officially sanctioned meet for the women, but was the squad's second consecutive triumph this season. Despite a rash of injuries, illnesses and various other impediments (ranging from bruises to soakers), six women conquered the 4000 metre, triple loop course.

Outstanding performances were brought in by UBC import Anne Webster, rookie Cathy Clarke, and veteran Susan Spence (who came up with a typically fine OWIAA run) and were definitely the clinchers for the Invitational title. The three were backed by good efforts from Debbie Pedigrew, Connie Nehr and Bev Code, who joined with delighted coach Curt Bolton to share the sweetness of the post-race victory wine.

A record 47 women representing 11 universities finished the Brock course. This proved that as the number of participants is steadily increasing each year, the calibre is improving dramatically. It was a fine ending to an excellent season for the X-C Gals.

B-Ball Gaels lack polish

by Martha Bell and Scott Haig

The Queen's Basketball Gaels are now just one week away from their season opener, and if the exhibition game October 21 against St. Lawrence College is any indication, the Gaels still have some work to do if they are going to be serious contenders for the Intercollegiate Basketball title.

Queen's won the game 76-63, but were not particularly impressive, as first game rustiness produced some rather ragged play. But only 4 of the 15 players on this year's squad were with the team last year, and as coach Tom Frood said after the game, "For a first game and a new team, they really played well."

Frood is keeping 15 players on the team this year, despite the fact that only 10 can dress for a game, in hopes of developing some young second string players into a strong nucleus for future years. In the game against St. Lawrence, Frood made a point of using players on the bench, leaving the rookies on the floor even when St. Lawrence put on pressure, just to give them some experience in game conditions.

Jeff Folkard in practice. -DAB

The Gaels are concentrating on a more precise development of their offence, says Frood, and will utilize the fast break as an offensive threat this season. After a 2-10 season last year, the Gaels are confident that the only way to go is up.

The team's next game is Monday night at 8:15, against State University College at Potsdam in New York.

Hockey Gaels on ice

by Chris Cuthbert

Fred O'Donnell, the coach of the Queen's Golden Gaels, approaches the start of the 1978-79 O.U.A.A. hockey season with a cautious air of optimism.

The Gaels, who missed post-season competition last year by a single point, have made a playoff berth in the always tough eastern division their primary objective for '78-79.

"We'll be gunning for first place but our primary concern is making the playoffs," said O'Donnell. "As well we hope to play a fast skating, more exciting brand of hockey this year."

Last season the Gaels overcame their lack of firepower with a plodding, tight checking style, so the promise of more exciting hockey should be good news for Queen's faithful.

"The key improvement on the team lies in our forwards," stated the sophomore coach. "The quality of our forwards has improved 50% this season."

The Golden Gaels will start the season with two well balanced scoring units and a third line consisting of "good skaters and strong forecheckers".

Ron Davidson, an O.U.A.A. all-star last season should be the foundation of the Gaels' offence this year. Joining Davidson on the wings are high scoring Kevin Treacy (12 goals in 11 games last year) and rookie Paul Stothart who divided his time last year between the Ottawa '67's and the Nepean Raiders.

Slick centre John MacIntyre will pivot another potential scoring unit. Right winger Willie Wing, returning from a one year absence, should provide leadership and experience, while Ron Folk has impressed with his play on the left side.

The third line is not set although rookie Steve Watt, a rugged worker, should crack the starting lineup. Veteran wingers Dale Sandals, Joe Minken and Gary Brandt will battle for the remaining jobs.

The biggest question mark for the Gaels is on defence. Graduation hit the blueline corps hard with no starters returning. Mike Conway, an all-star defenceman with McMaster last season will be paired with John Murray to form one dependable combination. As well, Joe South, a rookie from the Georgetown Jr. B's has looked strong.

Between the pipes the Golden Gaels have a talented corps of goaltenders. Barry Ashby, an O.U.A.A. all-star, will share the netminding chores with returners Dan Galbraith and Andy Chisholm.

Last weekend's Dutch Cup Tournament played here at Queen's, was a prelude to the regular season which opens this weekend with a double-header in Laurentian against the Voyageurs.

With the emergence of a solid

$270 for UW

by Ken Davies

The first United Way Touch Football tournament was contested the weekend of Oct. 21 and 22 with 16 teams competing for the title. The calibre of play and level of good sportsmanship were both extremely high throughout the tournament which featured such notable squads as Teams Tasmania, Hummer, Zingini and the Neversweats. The championship went to the Brock Busters in an exciting 13 to 8 victory over the favoured Meds 80 team. The consolation draw was won on an impressive performance by the Morris Old Boys.

The idea for the tournament was initiated by co-organizers Geoff Maier and Paul Spence last spring. As a result of prize donations from Molson's and keen participation, $270 was raised in support of the United Way.

The organizers hope that the tournament will become an annual event with even greater participation. The contestants expressed satisfaction with the day but there was a strong sentiment to include a compulsory female contingent on each team in future!

A LOOK AT BEWS

by Mark Pentland

Now that the predictions have been registered, it will be up to those teams not selected to prove their worth. Last week's predictions were based on real facts - the results from both last year and this year's early season. Most of last week's predictions will prove true. Some of last week's predictions will be made to look ridiculous.

Arts 79 may be the team that will make me eat each and every word of the predictions claimed. Through the arduous work of Fred "Beast" Burton, Arts 79 has placed themselves in the highest position ever in the John Paul and Bews Standings. Both their rugby squad and the softball team have undefeated seasons to date and their presence in play-off action will certainly be known.

Education is just back from their teaching session and it remains to be seen how powerful they may prove to be in Bews action in the next few weeks. They may teach us all a lesson and come away with a championship in either volleyball or flag football.

One unit from Law may prove a surprise contender for softball laurels defensive corps the Gaels could challenge for second place in the east.

as the Law faculty team captured a closely contested final game to win the interfaculty softball championship over Engineering. The law boys were true victors as they were forced to defeat Engineering in two consecutive games in the double elimination tournament.

Arts 80, Arts 81 and Arts 82 are off to rather slow starts this year, despite the efforts of the sticks of these units: Tom Walsh, Rick Taylor, John Sinclair and Winn Kennedy. Danny Pear (Arts Faculty Stick) is doing an outstanding job co-ordinating these Arts units and it is hoped that more Arts students will get involved with their individual teams to realize the potential that exists.

All units will have to field their best teams next week in order to secure play-off positions in the outdoor sports. Barring rain-outs, snowouts and other rescheduled games, play-offs in the outdoor sports will commence week eight.

Queen's radio: sports coverage

"From Halifax, this is CFRC"

by Tim Turnbull

Few people may be aware of CFRC's broadcast schedule, but an avid Gaels football fan is well aware that every game, whether home or away, is broadcast live on 1490 AM each Saturday during the autumn.

Last year, the sports crew travelled to Halifax in order to broadcast the Atlantic Bowl. Funds were provided by the donation which each student, knowingly or unknowingly, contributed to the CFRC Sports Trust Fund. That donation from the Student Interest Fee was recently raised from .25 to .40 per student so that CFRC can expand its coverage of Queen's sports.

Station manager Steve Cutway believes that important Queen's sporting events interest a sizable proportion of the student population and should be given adequate exposure. Queen's students are famous for their support of intercollegiate teams and CFRC is committed to cover Gaels games that students may not be able to attend personally. Throughout the year, the sports crew transmits live broadcasts of football, basketball and hockey games to the

As in any media coverage, the sports crew of Roger Galbraith, Tim Turnbull, Chris Cuthbert, Scott Whitley, Al Wilson and Jean Bangay (along with some new members) strives to present a fair interpretation of an event. Naturally, there is a bias towards the Queen's side competing, but the announcers shun any "rah-rah" antics. Objectivity is not an easy goal to attain, but rampant hysteria is no substitute for accurate broadcasting.

Above all, the announcers try to outline the basic facts in each game (ie down, yard line, score, time remaining) so that any listener can follow the progress of the contest.

Tim Turnbull, Chris Cuthbert, and Roger Galbraith cover the Golden Gaels victory at Bishop's.

Colour commentary and statistical analysis may concentrate more on the Gaels, however, the announcers know more about the Queen's athletes and strategies than about the opponents'. The other team is examined too, though to a lesser extent. The sports crew makes no apology for favouring Queen's competitors; we want them to win it at all possible. We are students who are publicizing Gaels exploits and quietly cheering for them at the same time.

None of the announcers has had professional training, though each member is qualified as a CFRC announcer. A sincere interest in sports and a strong desire to produce excellent results over the air has drawn some dedicated fans to the sports crew. A little spotlight. Chris Cuthbert and Tim Turnbull do voice reports of football games for CKWS and CKLC respectively. Since football broadcasts involve four announcers, one remote operator and one operator back at the station, a large amount of preparatory work is necessary before each game in order to run the show smoothly.

As each football game lasts nearly three hours, the crew must be able to analyze and comment on each teams' respective strategies, individual players and plays, other teams in the league, the importance of the game, background information (crowd, band, halftime show, etc.) and to publicize other Queen's teams in action. To do this, the announcers interview coaches and players from each team and scouts from professional clubs, read newspapers from Toronto, Kingston, Ottawa, Montreal and Halifax, examine statistical summaries sent out by the league, hear some inside information quietly leaked by Gaels coaches or players and maintain close contact with the athletic events manager, Rick Powers.

Armed with this plethora of information, the announcers attempt to inform and entertain listeners. A play will be described, then concisely commented upon, constantly mentioning the score for any listener who has just tuned in. Three announcers are on the air at one time, hence the need for close cooperation. The goal for the sports crew is to produce a show that combines score, action, background information and controlled excitement. This may be impossible, but Sports Director Roger Galbraith believes that since the Gaels are playing top-notch football, the radio coverage should be of the same high quality.

Many people ask how games are transmitted from out of town. Bell Canada installs a telephone outlet into the press box, which connects the remote operation to the station. The announcers speak into headsets, which are boosted by a small mixing board. This transmission is sent along a regular telephone line to the station where it is remixed and boosted again before reaching the transmitters. Queen's is one of the few, if not the only, university that broadcasts away games.

It is a credit to the various operators and equipment that the sound is so clear. They are still working on how to limit interference from the public address system (such as at Bishop's two weeks ago), but there is little that they can do. The operators have considered using bazookas to silence disturbing noise, but unfortunately, the idea was narrowly rejected.

Live broadcasts are supplemented by Sports '78, a weekly show on CFRC that examines Queen's and Canadian sports. It is aired every Thursday at 8 p.m. on 1490 AM. Listeners can hear interviews with Queen's athletes who have exhibited top performances during the previous weekend. Roger, Tim, Chris, Scott or Al will talk with at least one of the 'Athletes of the Week'. Queen's boasts a large array of intercollegiate teams and athletes that are intelligent, well-spoken people, well worth listening to each Thursday.

Over the summer, Chris and Scott interviewed members of the Toronto Boston and Kansas City baseball clubs. These interviews have since been played on Sports '78. Interviews with Gary Player, Lanny McDonald and the director of the Laval Hockey Research Centre will be presented in the upcoming weeks.

These programs could not be successful without student donations. The sports crew feels a special obligation to produce professional-sounding shows that will interest fans of any sports. But a sincere thanks must go to all the coaches and players that have supplied the crew with time for questions and valuable information, particularly the Gaels football team. Scouting reports and strategy are passed on to the announcers so that Gaels making good plays on the line or in the backfield will be recognized and mentioned. Players provide us with blocking tactics and defensive alignments so that we can help the listener to visualize the play and make accurate commentary. This assistance promotes an entertaining and intelligent broadcast.

Tune in to a CFRC sports program sometime—they are produced for the enjoyment of our listeners. And if you hear about the Gaels travelling to Halifax, you know that we will bring you all of the action live on CFRC.

"Noranda" will not fade; Trustees must answer the collective voice

The Noranda Mines investment issue is in danger of being swept under the carpet. The company, which is planning a $350 million investment in Chile, is prominent in Queen's investment portfolio; the university holds $250,000 of its shares.

Last November, Queen's interest in Noranda came under heavy fire from the campus at large. Students were incensed that Queen's should hold such a major investment in a company contemplating a multimillion dollar project in Chile, which, since the overthrow of democratic government, has engaged in flagrant violations of human rights and brutal repression of political dissent. In the largest referendum turnout in years, 72% of the voters opposed the investment. Further, both AMS Outer Council and Senate passed resolutions opposing it.

Now, less than a year later, the issue seems to have floundered on the rocks. Students have forgotten it, their representatives have not revitalized it, and the finance conscious Board of Trustees is enshrouding it in a veil of red tape.

A committee, struck by the Board at its recent meeting to examine and recommend on investments that provoked widespread unanimity of concern, may not even consider the Noranda issue. Despite the overwhelming referendum vote, despite both Outer Council and Senate resolutions, some members of the Board are as yet not convinced that unanimity of concern has been voiced.

One can quite readily understand the Board's indecision. It is its responsibility to assure the financial viability of our university, and it will not hastily divest of a quarter of a million dollars in shares.

The Board has already sent a delegation to discuss the issue with the president of Noranda Mines, Alfred Powis. According to reports, the discussion was "open and frank". As much as it was a step in the right direction, this meeting can not be construed as having satisfied the demands of either students in general, AMS Outer Council, or Senate.

The Board of Trustees, when first confronted with the issue, were able to delay a decision by contending they had not mechanism with which to properly consider it and make recommendations. That mechanism now exists, and it is distressing to find many Board members holding that Noranda not be considered by the committee.

On what grounds, one is led to ask, are these members disinclined to refer the Noranda question to the committee? Do they feel not enough unanimity of concern has been expressed? If such is the case, then they are either sorely misinformed, or unrealistically demanding. Surely the combined voices of Outer Council, the Senate, and literally thousands of Queen's students must be construed as "unanimity of concern". If not, then these members of the Board are simply being inflexible.

More likely, though, the members are concerned about the implications of divestiture, or a similar "drastic" action. In disallowing consideration of the Noranda issue by the committee, they would effectively force it out of the limelight, hence preserving a financially sound investment portfolio from threatening moral influences.

Assuming this is their real concern, nonetheless their position is untenable. Investments can not be considered only in terms of their financial viability. Though profitability is a prerequisite, so is moral virtue. Noranda Mines' proposed investment in Chile would be a patent withdrawal from moral virtuosity.

The human condition in Chile since the violent overthrow of democracy in September of 1973 has steadily worsened. General Pinochet and his military machine have brutally repressed dissent, have suspended human rights, and have made manifest the dark potential for violence that authoritarian rule inevitably contains.

A $350 million investment in Chile can only serve to consolidate the forces Pinochet has drawn around him. With a revitalized economy, he can further legitimate his rule, and repress those that would vie for a return to the constitution of democracy. Hence, it is simply unthinkable that Queen's condone the investment by donning a blindfold and hiding from the issue. We must express in the strongest possible terms, as a shareholder, our condemnation of Noranda's proposal, and our commitment to divest our holdings, if the proposal succeeds. Open and frank discussion with the president is just not enough.

Bitter Grounds: on financial rocks

by Julia Grunau

Bitter Grounds, the weekly coffee house run by the Engineering Society, is in grave danger of disappearing altogether from the Queen's campus, due to lack of funds.

According to Liz Dixon, this year's manager of Bitter Grounds, the problem could be solved with $1000 from the Queen's Entertainment Agency (QEA).

"It would make all the difference," she said "We're at the crucial stage. We've given them weekend-by-weekend monetary statements, formal requests for money. It's now or never."

Bitter Grounds is operating on a sizeable deficit and has requested support from the QEA on the strength of its $15,000 profit from the Concert fee collected from students last year. That profit, which was not spent on ticket price reductions, went back into the general AMS fund. The coffeehouse's staff and the Engineering Society feel that if profits of that sort are turned, then there is money to spare for supporting regular 'concerts' on the campus.

"We feel we operate on a concert basis, weekend to weekend, and the QEA is here to support entertainment," says Liz. And last year's Bitter Grounds manager, Steve Hunter, insists, "It could provide top-notch entertainment for two nights on weekends with that help. $1000 would be a dream come true."

Both Dixon and Hunter credit the Engineering Society with donating their pub space in Clark Hall on Saturday nights, loaning the coffee facilities, and providing simple cash. But that is just not enough to pay for skyrocketing food and entertainment costs. Hunter notes that a $200 a night act five years ago now costs $400, and that equipment depreciates and has to be replaced.

The QEA, said Bitter Grounds' business manager Rod Cooper, has not been paying attention to their pleas for help.

"It has more or less ignored us so far," he said. "Mark Opzoomer (Director) wasn't really receptive to giving us money. He just isn't doing anything. He hasn't really been hindering us, but he sure hasn't been helping either."

Cooper stated that he has sent two letters to Opzoomer informing him of the situation, and Dixon that she has sent weekly financial reports to the QEA to point out the seriousness of their request, yet they claim they haven't received a reply.

Opzoomer denied that the QEA is opposed to supporting faculty-run activities on campus, but also claims not to have received any financial statements whatsoever. He admitted to having received the letters but would not comment on his failure to answer them.

The AMS Outer Council will be debating on whether or not QEA should support activities such as Bitter Grounds within the next three weeks.

If this Queen's bandsman expects to take his over-sized beak to the College Bowl, the football Gaels will have to defeat the tough McGill Redmen Saturday. McGill demolished the Bishops Gaits last week 45-20.

Daycare facilities in need of expansion

by Beth McKenzie

Queen's Daycare Centre facilities are grossly inadequate but steps are being taken to expand their capacity, according to vice-president (University Affairs) Rory Cattanch.

Approximately 13% of Queen's students are either married or divorced with children, but the present facilities on Union Street can accommodate only 40 children. 136 children live in the Van Order Complex for married students alone, and 81 of these children are under five years of age and in need of Day Care.

Three proposals for expansion of the present facilities are now being investigated by the Principal's Advisory Committee on Day Care: 1) to expand the present facilities of Queen's Day Care on Union Street, which would accommodate 10-15 more children on a full-day basis, 2) to expand Queen's Day Care into Victoria Public School (located across from MacDonald Hall), providing places for 30 more children on a half-day basis only, or 3) to expand into new facilities at the Van Order Complex, providing places for 30-40 more children on a full-day basis.

There are now 121 names on the waiting list for entrance into the Day Care program, 59 of which are students'. The centre receives approximately 5-10 calls a week from people who want to enrol their children, but don't bother due to the length of the list.

According to Rory Cattanch, member of the committee, "The only way to ensure a place for a child is to put its name on the waiting list before it is even born."

Representatives from the university, from Van Order-Drive, from Queen's Day Care and from the AMS will be meeting next week with representatives from the community and Social Services to discuss which of these proposals should be adopted and who will direct the expansion. They hope to receive funding from the province which will cover up to 80% of the facilities' operating cost.

Phone system to change

Doug Ronson

The Bell Canada is considering replacing the current residence phone system with a system where students would negotiate directly with the company for phone service. Such a change would lower residence fees, but would probably cost students more on total.

Telephone expenses currently comprise about $43 of the residence fees, according to Gerald McGrath, Director of Residences. If the new system were instituted at Queen's, resident students would probably pay about the same fee as those living off campus about $76. McGrath also noted that the entire $43 would not be cut from residence charges because business and desk phones would still have to be paid for.

Bell Canada would not comment as this proposal has been marked 'company confidential'.

Chuck Meagher, Chairman of the LFRS, stated that he was not aware that Bell is considering such a system. "However, I would definitely like to see phones remain as part of the residence fees," he said.

McGrath stated that "Queen's has not yet heard formally from Bell Canada". The company told McGrath that it does not expect to have a proposal ready until the end of this month.

Last week, Mr. Vinnicombe, Director of Housing at Waterloo stated "Bell Telephone is going to switch (Waterloo) at about the same time as they switch Queen's. They are forcing this move."

However, McGrath said that he believes Bell has modified its position recently. "Bell hopes that universities adopt the system but may not be in a position to force such a move," he stated.

OFS, AMS petition to challenge students

by Michael Allen

The recently announced OFS Strategy for fall action must have student involvement if it is to gain credibility with the Ontario government.

"Student opinion, that's what we need to know. Without it, anything that the AMS or the Ontario Federation of Students (OFS) does about cutbacks will ring hollow," said AMS President Dave Brown.

Brown told Outer Council Wednesday that the crucial element of student input would make or break any organized effort to deal with university cutbacks. He challenged students to take a stand, "on the under-education that the government is trying to push on us." If this challenge is not met, (with student involvement), it will mean the forfeiting of higher quality education in the province of Ontario.

In an effort to generate awareness, the A.M.S. is circulating a petition entitled, "Take a Stand". It exhorts students to become aware, as individuals, of the effect of funding cuts on the accessibility of university to all, regardless of class, and on the quality of the education soon to be available to fewer and fewer Canadians.

"We need skilled people in Canada, not only to fill the nation's unsatisfied need for the technologically educated, but for skilled individuals to deal with the problems of the economy, of national unity, of the constitution and of the future of the country," said Brown.

Indeed, Brown's analysis seems substantiated by the fact that in the U.S., 40% of all Americans between 18 and 24 have received post-secondary training and in Canada this figure is only 16%.

A university symposium Wednesday on cutbacks produced some important facts about Queen's itself. Salaries of faculty and support staff (have been increased by approximately 5% this year) are falling well behind both the inflation rate (9%) and the average level of salary increases in Canada (8%).

According to several members of Outer Council, there is a crisis and it must have student participation to be overcome.

less, then the service will be discontinued next year, John Koopman, A.M.S. Vice-President (Operations) said at Outer Council Wednesday night.

"P.U.C. has had one hell of a deal for the last five years," Koopman said. "But if Jack Fee (PUC negotiator) won't give us a deal for less than a $100,000 then there will be no Bus-It as we know it now."

Last year Gord Howe negotiated for a two route programme and this year Koopman is negotiating for a programme which will not cost over $100,000, regardless of number of routes.

Last year, Queen's students collectively paid over $98,000 for the present Bus-It Programme.

The two bus routes that are presently offered are the Blue route - the King Crt., Polson Park run and the Orange route - the Division St., Calvin Park run. Twice as many people travel on the Orange route because people living in the Calvin Park area usually go to West Campus or are able to walk to the orange route. Virtually all students in the area are within a live-block walk. Living far from campus could be a choice rather than a necessity," said Ilmor Mahoney, A.M.S. researcher.

The possible outcomes include entirely dropping the Blue route or

$100,000 and your student card

the entire Bus-It Programme. If the Bus-It Programme is dropped, the suggestion of a Shuttle Service to West Campus run by Queen's for half the price should be considered. Along with the shuttle service, there could be an arrangement made with the PUC for lower priced student tickets for other Kingston routes.

Opt-Outs down

by Janet Brick

Only 300 students chose to opt-out of the AMS concert fee this year compared to the 1500 concert opt-outs last year. This 80% drop does not include West Campus results yet John Koopman, AMS vice-president of operations, felt these figures were indicative of student attitudes, especially since opting-out was unintentionally extended a day.

The extension was due to faulty advertising on the part of Info Bank who announced opt-outs would be held Wednesday and Thursday, when they had originally been scheduled for Tuesday and Wednesday only.

When asked the reason for such a dramatic decline in opt-outs, Koopman replied, "I think Sheila's (Murray) and my leadership have increased confidence in the quality of the concerts". To date, only 150 have opted-out of the six dollar Tricolour fee, compared to the 800 of last year.

Convocation honours Beverage

SPECIAL - Grant Hall was filled with proud relatives and friends as six hundred Queen's students received degrees at Fall Convocation on Saturday.

James MacDonald Richardson Beverage, President of Acadia University and the first Dean of the School of Graduate Studies and Research at Queen's, was the recipient of an honorary degree in the morning ceremony, while James Russell Mallory, political economist at McGill University was conferred an honorary LLB at the afternoon ceremony.

In his address to convocation, Principal R.L. Watts congratulated the graduates, and expressed his hope that they would continue to support their university in any way possible.

Dr Beverage, stressed the importance of conducting basic research at the university setting over external contractual research work. He pointed to the danger of basic research being neglected while university researchers pursued contractual projects.

Members of the school of Graduate studies of Research, Applied Science, Business, Law, Rehabilitation Therapy, Education, Arts & Science and Physical & Education received degrees at the morning ceremony, and students from the faculty of Arts & Science convoked in the afternoon.

"Eternal sunshine"

Pyramid Fever

by John Baktis

Pyramid Fever is a state of mind which spreads like a highly infectious cancer according to Ian "Woody" Woods, a former Queen's student.

Pyramid Fever was developed over 5,000 years ago in the pyramids of ancient Egypt and was recently uncovered by a group of university students behind the Iron Curtain.

"They opened up Pandora's Box and rediscovered all the treasures of this ancient tradition," said Woods.

The Fever is a state of mind in which one indulges in total positive thinking.

"If people are absolutely happy with the way things are; that's great," said Woody, "but if they're not, then Pyramid Fever can change things around."

According to Woods, the Fever can be broken down into three distinct states of mind with the third phase being the ultimate in total happiness.

The first phase gives the person an incredible amount of energy. In the second phase the person experiences an incredible amount of paranoia.

"With the increase of personal responsibility, comes the fear of not being able to handle it," said Woods. "This is where the third state comes into play." The third and final plateau of the mind instructs one on how to deal with this paranoia. At this stage one gains the power of total positive thinking. All the mistakes of the past are seen to be blessings in disguise. One learns from these errors so that the present and the future will seem like an "eternal sunshine."

"This progression of the mind (HOE) can change one's interpretation of the past so that everything in the past happened for the good of all," said Woods.

The dreamlike state of "nothing can go wrong" is achieved in this third stage. The only person believed to be in this state is a man in Toronto who prefers to remain anonymous. Only he can guide some one through the various stages. According to Woods, this man will be coming to Queen's to discuss the aspects of Pyramid Fever.

Once you have come in contact with the concept of Pyramid Fever then the bug has infected you and you become a part of that dream.

Cattanach removes YPC papers from QSAC tables

by Tim Greenwood

Pamphlets concerning cutbacks published by the Young PCs have been removed from the information tables of Queen's Students Against Cutbacks (QSAC) after a brief appearance there.

The removal of the pamphlets occurred Wednesday, the third day of Cutbacks Education Week, as the result of an order from AMS Vice-president Rory Cattanach.

"Student's Against Cutbacks is a biased organization in that it is against cutbacks. Their mandate does not include supporting PC Youth," Cattanach said explaining his decision before Outer Council.

At least one Outer Council member was displeased with Cattanach's action saying "Cutback education week ought to be just that education about cutbacks and should include discussion from all different points of view."

The brunt of the YPC message is found on the backcover of the pamphlet which reads "This year Ontario taxpayers paid $3,770 per student for post-secondary education. Next year they'll pay $4,000 per student. Some cutback!"

Cattanach maintains that it is an organization wishes to disseminate information taking a stance opposed to that of QSAC they should set up their own tables.

Pamphlets put out by the Socialist party which take a definitive anti-cutback stance remain on the QSAC information tables.

Goddoo worse than Wives

The Editor:

Rarely does the internal politicking of the A.M.S., Q.E.A., A.S.U.S. or any of the myriad multiple initial organization on campus raise my emotions to anything approaching a fever pitch. But the fact that Mark Opzomer and the members of the shining white A.M.S. Inner Council feel that they know what "is in the student body's interest", makes me start to shimmy and shake with rage.

I seriously doubt whether any of the socially conscious members of the A.M.S. and QEA have made any attempt to compare the music of Goddoo and Battered Wives and decide which would be more beneficial for Queen's students. If they have, then they are tone deaf, and if they haven't, then they are hypocrites of the most despicable variety. If the argument against Battered Wives pertains only to their name, I would like to ask Mr. Opzomer what redeeming features he sees in such Goddoo song titles as "Carol Kiss My Whip" or "Cock On".

The point is that anyone who takes the trouble to investigate Battered Wives will realize that they are a band whose tongue is firmly in its cheek. To ban them out of a twisted sense of "social responsibility" is so absolutely ludicrous that I find it difficult to fathom. To replace them with such a blatantly mindless, talentless and loathsome band as Goddoo causes one to think that Mr. Opzomer must have recently undergone a full frontal lobotomy from the Joseph Goebbels school of social control.

One could go on for pages about how this incident is symptomatic of a deeper malaise in our student government. One could mention the fact the "strong negative reaction among portions of the student body" was either made up or well hidden. One could point out that nobody who did not wish to see a band with the yech, disgusting, anti-humanitarian name of Battered Wives "was under any compulsion to attend the concert but there would be no point. The airheads who made this insane decision will stick by it and come up with solid ethical reasons for doing so ad nauseum.

The headline to a well written much needed comment by Mr. Stephen McNevin on the whole farcical "business read "Our Liberalism is questioned." Your Liberalism isn't questioned Mark Opzomer. It's ruddy non-existent Mark Migotti.

Editor's note. The "social responsibility" quotation attributed to Opzomer in last Tuesday's Journal was actually the reason cited by him by AMS Inner Council in its decision not to allow "Battered Wives".

The omnipotent hand of the AMS has come down once again, this time in a stand which cannot be condoned. The banning of "Battered Wives" on grounds of "immorality" reflects infringements of student rights and absolute narrow-mindedness on the part of the censors.

First, the basic goal of a University is to expose the student body to a plethora of knowledge and subsequently generate forums for opinion. Cardinal to realizing such goals is exposure to a broad range of experiences—including those which might be viewed as immoral.

Second, if one does find the name or style of the music offensive then it can be easily avoided by not attending the concert. It is therefore not a question of trade-offs, as both pro- and anti- proponents can be satisfied; those who wish to view the

Essential or Indecent exposure?

The Editor:

The omnipotent hand of the AMS has come down once again, this time in a stand which cannot be condoned. The banning of "Battered Wives" on grounds of "immorality" reflects infringements of student rights and absolute narrow-mindedness on the part of the censors.

concert can do so without denying those who don't want to see the concert their personal rights.

The final point one must question is which feature of the group is "immoral" The AMS cited both name and logo as inappropriate. Such reasoning fails on two accounts. Firstly, a name is simply a label and has no meaning in itself. It is the performance which matters—the quality of music does not change with the name and should not be prejudiced against on such a pretext.

Secondly, is the name itself "Battered Wives" immoral? The title reflects violence, mental disorder and exploitation of women. These phenomena do occur in our society and their existence should not be hidden. If these are societal malaises then why should one turn a blind

Student apathy is not lethargy

The Editor:

I would like to extend my congratulations to Mr. McNevin for his pointed letter expressing his dissatisfaction with the decision by the student government of this institution to cancel the appearance of Elvis Costello's band "Battered Wives". Mr. McNevin has my complete support in his thorough treatment and evaluation of the moral issues involved. However, I feel there are other points that should be raised.

First of all, what is this "...negative reaction to the band's name..." and the resulting "social responsibility" of the AMS, Mr. Opzomer, and the QEA? Do these people believe that if students experience this band it will lead to some sort of "New Wave" social revolution at Queen's? Perhaps the feeling is that the "Battered Wives" will spread some non-medical social disease, or maybe the AMS and QEA are fearful the band, should they perform here, would leap off the stage and begin to batter the wives of members of the audience.

From this conservative and bureaucratic reasoning one might get the impression that only bands such as "Status Quo" would be permitted to perform at Queen's. If it was the students who objected to the name "Battered Wives", then neither I nor anyone I know was consulted on the matter. If it was an organization outside of Queen's that objected to it, then they plainly have no business interfering with the internal affairs of Queen's and its students.

Furthermore, a comment should be made concerning the financial aspects of the situation. Although the band is not to play here, the AMS must honour its financial and contractual commitment. This means that the fees of every student at this university, are being used to pay a band that is not performing here. I suggest the money to pay for this non-existent portion of the Costello concert should come from the pockets of those members of the student government who have decided students should not be exposed to the "Battered Wives".

This entire incident provides ample reason why students at Queen's have no wish to become involved in student government—it is not a question of apathy, but a distaste for being associated with idiocy.

Sincerely,
Willie Heffernan, Arts '36

Sincerely,
Ken Honig

Journal report and editorial taken to task

The reality of residence boards

The Editor, I hope that the following will dispel some of the misunderstanding which the article, "Little Student Input in Residences" and the editorial, "Reconstitute Residence Board" may have created.

There is, in fact, an abundance of student input into the residence system, and to suggest otherwise is to greatly underestimate the value of student contribution from the W.R.C., the L.F.R.S., the Royce Student Council and the Apartment Tenants. Students sit on the Residence Board, the Leonard Board, the Ban Righ Board, the Apartments Board and have representation on every other committee pertaining to students' activities including the Dining Room Committee, the Committee to select Dons and Warden and the Financial Advisory Committee of the Residences' Board which consists of three students and two "others". This committee is an important one, particularly, since it gives advice to the Board and to the Vice-Principal, Resources, which directly affects the preparation of the annual budget.

Although, as the Journal pointed out, students constitute only 26% of the Queen's Residence Board, the number alone does not tell the tale. The three students who sit on the Residence Board from the sub-boards are representative of all students in residence. They are usually the Presidents of their respective student governments and are free to bring, as they often do, other members of their councils for advice and support. The other two students, a Senate appointee and the President of the A.M.S., represent even wider constituencies. Their ideas and suggestions are a very important part of Board deliberations, as they should be, and they have tremendous influence in policy-making decisions.

With regard to the other issues raised in the articles, I would like to add the following:

(1) The composition of the Board, one-quarter students, one-quarter full-time teaching faculty, one-quarter alumni(ae) and one-quarter administrators, was approved by the Senate as recently as last year. The Board is a Committee of the Senate and, as such, reflects in its composition, the constituencies found in the university as a whole.

(2) Student representation on residence boards at Queen's dates from the mid sixties when students joined the Ban Righ and Leonard Boards. The Residence Board, itself, has had students since its inception in 1969.

(3) Student representation and input is not only "officially" sanctioned by the Senate, but is actively welcomed and sought out by the boards. The minutes of the Residence Board during the last year make mention many times of ways to broaden the Board's contact with the students. Formally this is done by having open meetings of all residence boards; (the next Residence Board meeting is November 24 at 3:00 p.m. in the Games Room at Victoria Hall); informally this is done by dining at High Table, hosting receptions for Dons and Wardens, attending student functions etc.

(4) McGill is not unique in its "live-in" Director. The Dean of Women lives in Victoria Hall where she is involved in student life twenty-four hours a day. Her contribution to all young people is of enormous value. The Director, while not currently a "live-in", nonetheless lived in Morris Hall as its Warden for more than four years and is well acquainted with student concerns.

(5) Students are rightly concerned about the high cost of fees, and, as any reading of the Residence Board minutes will show, this is the No. 1 Priority of the Residence Board. Unfortunately, fees are the only source of revenue for the residence system and they must be sufficient to cover all residence costs; i.e., mortgage payments, maintenance and repair, capital expenditures, staff salaries etc. Good housekeeping, pleasant surroundings and reasonable meals all cost a great deal of money, and Queen's residences provide the best quality of student accommodation in Ontario.

(6) The Alumni of Queen's do not play the role of an "eminence grise" as the Journal implies. They are, after all, former students themselves, and take an active and interested part in university affairs. Not only did the Alumni Association raise the funds and provide the impetus to start the residence system at Queen's by building Ban Righ Hall, but it provides assistance to needy students annually by means of the Alumni Student Contingency Fund and the Dean of Women's Trust Fund. Setting aside the millions of dollars raised by the Alumni Association for past, present and future generations of Queen's students, the contribution of Alumni is seen in many smaller but thoughtful ways—the donation of furniture for Leonard Hall Common Room in 1976, the donation of a piano for MacNeill House in 1977, (spontaneously given by the Directors of the Alumni Association during an annual meeting), a summer job found by alumni in Calgary for a stranded student this past year—the list is endless. This is Queen's, remember—students, staff, alumni and administrators are not antagonists but members of a community working together to solve mutual problems.

The joys of residence—were you consulted?

McBey

Any student wishing to add his own "input" may do so by contacting any Board member. Names and phone numbers are available through the Senate office. The Boards are well aware of their responsibilities toward student concerns and will continue to act accordingly.

Yours very truly,
Pat Douglas-Murray
Chairman, Residences Board.

The "gift" of alumni time

The Editor,

I wish to register my disagreement with a point made in the lead Journal article on Friday, October 27.

Doug Ronson quotes Brian Copeland as having complained of the purchase of alumni of "immense influence" on "residence boards, out of proportion to the amount they have given".

To suggest that the Queen's Alumni sit on residence boards in order to wield power is both untrue and unjust. It is more accurate to view the time and energy devoted to board positions as a gift to the residences, in addition to the monetary gifts which some alumni make.

A position on a residence board involves long hours of Saturday meetings and thankless work with no remuneration. It would be a rare board member who could derive a sense of power from this job.

"Alumni" as a generic term seems almost to have become pejorative. The alumni under discussion are simply people who used to be Queen's students, and whose devotion to the University did not end on graduation day.

Yours sincerely,
Dawn E. Cannon

A day in the life of a YPC

Raging across the nation is the latest campus fad: the Young Progressive Conservative. Everywhere YPC's are coming out of their closets and proudly announcing that they voted for Stanfield in 1974. It is a phenomenon that two years ago no one would ever have dreamt possible.

My editor, with his finely-honed sense of what is newsworthy, asked me to spend a whole 24 hours with a representative YPC and report back on this exciting new breed. I was given a name and an address. Late one night, tape recorder in hand, I headed off for my rendezvous with Conservatism.

Midnight: Your trusty reporter crawls into bed with YPC and his fiancée. All YPC's have fiancées. Normally, a YPC doesn't sleep with his own fiancée. He only sleeps with other YPC's fiancées. At YPC conventions, mainly. It's the Conservative way of reconciling the Sexy 70's with the necessity of bridal virginity.

And it adds drama for the YPC. On his wedding night there's the excitement of finding out if his bride is really as good as all his friends say she is.

So why was fiancée in YPC's bed, contrary to norm? Propriety. It would be bad for YPC's career if it got around that he'd spent the night with a non-YPC reporter. Even if all the reporter was doing was recording snore patterns and observing REMS.

So, there we were, a cosy threesome. On the right (of course) lay YPC, spiffy in what I believe was a 3-piece suit. However, as it was dark I wasn't sure. His fiancée, in the middle, was demure in her Smart Outfit, panty-hose and Chanel. I was on the left in my grotty old pi's, tape-recorder balanced on my tummy.

A day in the life of YPC had begun.

Trudeau demise not media plot

The Editor:

It appears that Drew Fagan would like to believe that the troubles currently being experienced by the Prime Minister have been concocted by the news media. Surely Mr. Fagan, you can't be serious.

The Trudeaumania phenomena which propelled Mr. Trudeau to victory in 1968 was created not by the media, but by the Liberal campaign organization. In the general election of 1972 the Liberals were returned to power with a minority, not because of the media, but because Mr. Trudeau projected the image of an arrogant man, too sure of himself, his party, and victory.

Mr. Fagan contends that the by-elections of 16 October are merely a rebuke of the government. Given the magnitude of the Liberal defeat, and the number and distribution of the by-elections, the results in fact represent the demise of the federal Liberals outside Quebec.

Current polls show that the Liberals have lost much of their popular support in the Maritimes, Ontario, and the West—the best the Liberals could hope for in a general election would be a minority government with very little representation from outside of Quebec. Is this merely a concoction by the media?

If Mr. Fagan truly believes that trends towards economic recovery will bring the electorate back to the Liberals, he would be well advised not to hold his breath. Economic recovery under a Trudeau government does not appear to be imminent.

No Mr. Fagan, this is not a media concoction. It is the result of a brilliant politician hampered by his own stubbornness and arrogance. It is the result of a weak Cabinet. It is the result of a government which, over the last decade, has divided the country, and crippled its economy. The by-election results were the result of a long term disenchantment with the government which began as early as 1972 and is not abating.

As the next election rapidly approaches, Mr. Trudeau appears to be running very hard for Leader of the Opposition, while Joseph Clark looks more and more like the Prime Minister every day. Allan C. Brayley

As it turns out, YPC and Fiancée did neck a little during the night, when I was changing tapes. YPC's always get embarrassed post-necking. It's only proper. Socialists never get embarrassed after necking because they are so promiscuous. They believe in sharing wealth, and as often as possible.

Small wonder Socialists always look so run down. Stephen Lewis always had such big bags under his eyes that at airports they used to ask him if he needed a porter to carry them. And look at poor Ed Broadbent.

Fiancée wants to travel to Europe and see many nations. YPC doesn't care so much about going to Europe, but he thinks a multi-national might be nice.

And at this point I have run out of space. 'A Day in the Life of a YPC' will be continued on Tuesday.

Residence board precludes real input

Beyond the cosmetics

by Ross Finnie

The question of student input into residence management was broached by the Journal last week. Queen's was found to be well behind four of the five other universities surveyed. Ms. Douglas-Murray's (and others) replies represent a wide-spread naivety.

That minority representation on advisory boards is assumed to be equated with real influence. This is simply not the case. The residence advisory board doesn't grant student representatives any real influence or power, mainly because of voting arrangements, and because these advisory board decisions are subject to administrative veto.

"Representation" is lovely, but the fact is that after the student has voiced his opinion on behalf of thousands of other students, the board can simply say "thank you for your communication", you have now "participated" (democratically even?) and now the board will decide as it wishes. The decision might then be over-ruled anyway.

Furthermore, the board only acts directly on relatively minor issues, more important decisions are left to the administration. It is clear who has the real power with respect to residences.

Also, when Ms. Douglas-Murray refers to a few students being "representative of all students in residence" she implies that this is something to be pleased with. But I ask, if the input is so crucial and significant, why aren't there more student delegates so that better representation might be made? Maybe even a greater voting share would be appropriate?

So, students have limited input to an advisory board, which itself has limited input to the final decisions. Not really very impressive!

Of course many would argue that student representatives should be as impotent as they are, arguing that they don't know how to make important decisions—better to let them make recommendations only, and then allow the "wiser" elders to ultimately decide. Who is wiser is contentious, and this attitude overlooks the fact that the quality of any (student) representation will vary directly with the importance of the position. After all, who can get genuinely excited about such token input as now prevails?

So Ms. Douglas-Murray and others, please don't prate about how lucky we students should consider ourselves to be, because we have a few basically cosmetic representatives. The real decision making power remains unameliorated with others—staff, alumni, and especially administration.

Bradstreet's iceberg

The Editor:

In reference to Mr. Stratton's review concerning the Bradstreet concert, I think it is necessary that someone represent the view of those "shocked

Now possibly this is as it should be (although quite possibly not!) but let us recognize student input for what it is—a minor influence amongst the establishment and eternal authority vested in other bodies.

While it is virtually entirely students who live in residence, we will continue to do as we are told; after all, who are we to make important decisions pertaining to our own living conditions? Such impertinence!

folkies" and as Stratton so blatantly puts it, "music aficionados" who attended the concert.

Any artist who changes his style to meet the music market standards deserves at least the respect of the audience to which he plays. Bradstreet's audience on Sunday evening was willing to listen, with respect, to what he had to offer. It was not so much what he played which induced the "iceberg" effect exhibited by the audience, but how he played.

Bradstreet's opening song was a miserable attempt at rock. The bass and acoustic guitars were completely muddled and even out of tune and context with the melodic line of the song (if it had one). However, Bradstreet's "Distant Field", incorporating both rock and blues, illustrated that the hand did have the potential to "get it together". Queen's folkies will "be better prepared to accept a rock and roll David Bradstreet" when David Bradstreet can handle rock and roll as well as he can manipulate folk.

Co-operation on residence board

The Editor:

I am writing concerning the Journal article "Little student input in residences" (October 27). Not only was the headline misleading, but the article itself did not reflect the reality of decision-making in the residence system.

I found it particularly interesting that the "student" viewpoint quoted is one of a student who served in my position a number of years ago. During his term of office he had to deal with issues and circumstances much different from those presently encountered by students in residence.

It has been my experience in dealings with the Director of Residences, and with members of the Residences Board, that they are very concerned that the stands they take reflect the student viewpoint. The number of students on the various boards tells only part of the story. It fails to take into consideration the co-operative rather than confrontational atmosphere in which Residences Board decisions are made.

Perhaps the best indication of the present state of student input comes from those students who have daily influence in the residence system. On October 30 at a regular meeting of the Leonard Field Residents Council—the student governing body on the field—a motion was passed unanimously expressing the students' satisfaction with their current level of input.

Sincerely,
Chuck Meagher, Chairman
Leonard Field Residents Society

The forgotten prisoners

In Uganda

by Amnesty International

The structure of repression created and perpetuated in Uganda by President Idi Amin, marked by arbitrary arrest, torture, murder and the removal of all basic rights, has penetrated all areas of Ugandan society from the severely diminished urban elite to the poorest rural peasant.

The number of those killed by security officers during the seven years of the regime is estimated at not less than 100,000 and is probably many more. The names of only a small number are known; the majority are "unknown" and, if the regime had its way, would be forgotten. Thousands of other Ugandans have been forced to flee the country.

Members of former President Obote's ethnic group, the Lango, and the related Acholi, have been particular targets of arbitrary arrest and killing. Within the army several massacres of Acholi and Lango soldiers took place between 1971 and 1973, and it is reported that, after the discovery of an alleged plot to overthrow President Amin in February 1977, there was a death list of all Acholi and Lango prominent in the professions, educational institutions and the civil service. Although a number managed to escape from Uganda, many were arrested and are now feared dead.

Y Y Okot became a suspect for Ugandan security officers because he was from Acholi district. Mr. Okot (known as "Y Y") had been headmaster at Busoga College and he later became Chief Inspector of Schools in Uganda. In this capacity he worked hard to prevent the deterioration of educational standards under the military regime. He was arrested on 16 February 1977 and, under torture or the threat of torture, forced to make a public confession of involvement in a plot to overthrow the government.

The Nazi's in Germany put away the communists and I said nothing for I was not a communist.

Then they put away the Jews and I said nothing for I was not a Jew.

Then they got rid of the trade unionists and I said nothing for I was not a trade unionist.

Then they put me away and at this point in time there was nobody left who dared say anything.

Pastor Martin Niemöller

Mr. Okot and 16 others - mostly from Acholi and Lango districts - were later accused of treason in connection with the alleged plot. The defendants, who were denied legal representation, were tried by secret military tribunal. Twelve of them, including Mr. Okot, were sentenced to death and publicly executed in Kampala on 9 September 1977.

Persecution and killings are not confined to the Acholi and Lango but affect all sectors of society throughout Uganda. Mass arrests and killing by the security forces often follow any incident thought to affect the security of the regime, from alleged coup attempts to the circulation of leaflets or demonstrations against the regime. With the breakdown of the rule of law, many people have been arrested and killed simply because a security official decided to possess their wife, house, coffee crop or other property.

People arrested in Uganda are taken for interrogation to barracks or other centers belonging to the security forces. This generally involves torture and frequently results in killing.

Torture often leads to the victim's death, though detainees are also killed in other ways, either by prison guards or other security officers, or by other prisoners. One frequently-reported method of killing is to promise a detainee freedom in exchange for killing other detainees by hammering them on the head: usually the killer is then himself killed.

Those who have been arrested or have "disappeared" are rarely seen again, and their relatives are generally too afraid of reprisals to make appeals or publicity about their relative's disappearance. President Amin denies that there have been massive violations and claims that human rights are respected in Uganda.

In Rhodesia

By Amnesty International

Since the intensification of guerrilla warfare in Rhodesia in late 1972, some 500,000 or more African civilians have been moved into so-called "protected villages" or "consolidated villages" by the Rhodesian authorities. The first "protected villages" were established in the extreme north-east of the country in 1973/74, but the system has since been extended to include most African areas, or Tribal Trust Lands (TTLs), along the eastern border with Mozambique and in various other areas in the south and west of the country.

The ostensible reason put forward by the government of Prime Minister Ian Smith for the removal of African civilians into "protected villages" is that they can then be protected effectively against the activities of nationalist guerrillas.

However, there is considerable evidence to suggest that, while the need to guarantee protection may have been the initial motive, the system of "protected villages" is now used to punish African civilians suspected of supporting the guerrillas.

Most protected villages resemble fenced, fortified encampments. They are situated in the so-called "operational areas", where Rhodesian security forces have powers analogous to martial law. At the center of each such "village" there is a "keep" occupied by officials of the Ministry of Internal Affairs. Keeps are usually surrounded by earth ramparts and wire fences, and form the strong point of each "village". The civilian population lives outside the "keep", normally encircling it. Then the entire area is surrounded with barbed wire fences.

In fact, many Africans have described the "protected villages" as "cages" and claim that they are designed in such a way that African civilians are used as a human shield to protect the officials who live in the centre of the village.

People in the villages are subject to curfew and must carry identity tags which have to be shown when leaving or re-entering. The authorities have powers to control and regulate all food supplies, enforce compulsory labour and control the movement of all traffic and entry into the area. As a result, and because people in the "protected villages" cannot continue their normal farming activities, there is considerable hardship, suffering and starvation. On a number of occasions, Rhodesian officials have threatened African civilians with removal to the "protected villages" if they do not report guerrillas to the security forces.

A leaflet, issued in English and Shona in January 1978 and addressed to the people of Maranke TTL and Mukuni African Purchase Area (APA), is typical. It states:

"For a long time you have continued to feed, shelter and assist the communist terrorists to carry out their evil deeds. You have disregarded previous Government warnings of the bitter times that will fall upon your land if you allow these communist terrorists to carry on deceiving you". It then goes on to list a number of restrictions which were to be enforced from 20 January 1978. These include: an 18 hour curfew on adults, with effectively a 24 hour curfew on children under 16, and prohibition of the use of any vehicle.

The people were warned that they would be shot on sight if they broke the curfew or went on or near high ground. Schools, stores and grinding mills have been closed. The leaflet concluded by stating that "Only if you co-operate and assist the Security Forces in eliminating the communist terrorists will any consideration be given to lifting some or all of the above restrictions".

In the USSR

By Amnesty International

Among the cases of psychiatric abuse in the USSR known to AI is a category of "forgotten prisoners" confined in psychiatric hospitals for dissenting political or religious convictions, and left for long periods of time, in conditions of virtual secrecy.

The obscurity of their cases and the difficulty of obtaining information about their present conditions has resulted in both a lack of awareness of their fates and probably, greater exposure to ill-treatment.

A typical example of such a "forgotten prisoner" is Nikolai Baranov. AI first adopted Baranov as a prisoner of conscience in 1971 after the Moscow samizdat human rights journal, A Chronicle of Current Events, reported that he had been arrested for "anti-Soviet agitation and propaganda" and confined to a special psychiatric hospital. For a long time no further information about his situation was available.

In 1976 AI stopped work on Baranov's case after it was reported that he had been released from imprisonment. However, recent reports show that since 1974 he has been confined in the special psychiatric hospital in Kazan, and that has been subjected to intensive treatment with neuroleptic drugs.

When his mother visited him in August 1976 he asked her to appeal to Academician A.D. Sakharov to intervene on his behalf. For this he was reportedly injected with powerful drugs. Latest reports say that his family have received no letters from him in the past few months.

Another striking example is Annasoltan Kekilova, a well-known young Turkmen poet, arrested on 26 August 1971 and confined to a psychiatric hospital because she had written letters to the Communist Party of the Soviet Union criticising conditions in the Turkmen SSR. Two days earlier, she had reportedly been pronounced healthy by the local hospital. According to Ms Kekilova's mother, the doctors in the psychiatric hospital told her daughter: "If you don't give us a signed statement that you wrote to the central Committee because you were in a nervous condition, you'll stay in hospital forever."

Over the next few years no further information on Ms Kekilova was forthcoming. In May 1978, however, one of Ms Kekilova's adoption groups received a reply from the deputy Minister of Health of the Turkmen SSR in which he confirmed that she was still interned in a psychiatric hospital.

It is quite likely that Ms Kekilova has been subjected to "treatment" with neuroleptic drugs. These are frequently administered to dissenters confined to psychiatric hospitals for both punitive, disciplinary reasons and as a means of compelling them to renounce their dissenting views. They are often applied without the necessary correctives which results in particularly painful and distressing side-effects, e.g. severe shaking, frothing at the mouth, constant restlessness and disrupted mental processes.

Vladimir Titov, for example, was forcibly treated with drugs including haloperidol and aminazin. If he refused to take the drugs (which cause his body to suffer convulsive jerking) he was strapped to his bed for periods of up to a week. Titov, a disillusioned former KGB officer, had been sentenced in 1969 to five years' imprisonment for "anti-Soviet agitation and propaganda" after applying to renounce his Soviet citizenship.

AI knows of many other prisoners who have been confined to psychiatric hospitals for long periods, for non-medical reasons, but about whom there is very little information. e.g. Vyacheslav Yatsenko, a Ukrainian Marxist who expressed nationalist views was confined to a

In Taiwan

By Amnesty International

After its withdrawal from the Chinese mainland in 1949, the Nationalist government (Kuomintang) established itself in Taiwan, and during the 1950s instigated large scale arrests of both Taiwanese and Chinese mainlanders on suspicion of communist connections.

The arrests were carried out under the regulations of the state of siege declared on 19 May 1949, which suspended all constitutional guarantees of individual rights and freedoms.

The state of siege, which was to last as long as 'communist rebellion' existed on the mainland, is still in force.

Offenders convicted under the 1949 "Statute for the Punishment of Sedition" (or "Rebellion") are tried by military tribunal and are denied practically all rights of defence. The Statute includes offences such as to "surrender to a seditious person", to "incite strikes among workers, students or businessmen"; to "disseminate rumours or groundless information that are liable to disturb public order or morale".

Those arrested in the 1950's were generally charged and tried on charges of "sedition" for suspected pro-communist activities or sympathies. For instance, Chinese mainlanders could be convicted merely for having lived in an area controlled by communists when they were still on mainland China.

The number arrested during this wave, and still in detention, is not known, and little information is available about them. However, Amnesty International has the names of 46 who have been imprisoned since that time.

Many are known to be held in a prison camp on Green Island (Lu tao), off the south-east coast of Taiwan. This camp holds prisoners sentenced to long-term or life imprisonment. Conditions are reported to have been extremely harsh in the camp during the 1950s and early 1960s, although it appears to have been modernized since then. However, the mere location (prisoners live in complete isolation from the outside world because of the difficulty of visiting the island) makes it one of the most dreaded prisons in Taiwan.

Amnesty International

Amnesty International was founded in 1961 to work for the release of individuals imprisoned for reasons of race, religion or conscientiously held beliefs.

Special Psychiatric Hospital in late 1975; Lev Ubozhko, a physicist from Sverdlovsk in western Siberia who was confined in 1973; and Nikolai Breslavsky who has been confined for over 25 years, for attempting to leave the USSR.

Unfortunately there are many more cases where AI's information amounts to little more than a name, e.g. Jak Leivand, an Estonian; Popov, a poet from Bashkiria; Lyubov Nastusenko, a Ukrainian; and Vladas Majauskas, a Lithuanian, who were confined for expressing nationalist views.

In the words of Peter Benenson, founder of the movement, it was created "to bring out of the dungeons the 'Forgotten Prisoners'".

Since then Amnesty International has become a worldwide movement with over 200,000 members actively working for the release of Prisoners of Conscience and to inform the public about the responsibility of governments for violations of basic human rights, in particular, the violations of arbitrary detention, torture, unfair trials and the death penalty.

The Kingston chapter of Amnesty International is working for 3 prisoners of conscience and is also involved in the Campaign Against Torture. Their next meeting is on Monday, Nov 6, at 7pm in the International Centre.

Midnight Express way off track

by Chris Copp

The best friend of any mediocre film script is the wonderfully qualifying subtitle, "Based on the true story of..." For the film, Midnight Express, that blank is filled in with the name of a young American, Billy Hayes. Not that it really matters in the end because the film is little more than a tribute to classic movie melodrama. The human determination that enabled Hayes to endure and finally escape from the horrors of a Turkish prison in the early 1970's is somehow lost. In Midnight Express, Hayes (played by Brad Davis) is shown to be more than merely human: He is driven by a glowing sense of justice and moral dignity that can only be defined as "American". The sincerity of Billy Hayes' "true story" is magically transformed on the screen in favour of a healthy portion of ideological nonsense.

The story itself is relatively simple. Billy Hayes is caught at the Turkish border with two kilos of hashish in an attempt to smuggle it into the United States. Consequently he is imprisoned in Turkey with a four year sentence to serve. While in jail, he is retried and receives a new and grossly unjust 30 year term. The retrial is the turning point. He must escape or resign himself to an eventual death in a living Hell.

Midnight Express focuses mainly on the arrest, conviction and generally violent way of life that appears to typify the Turkish penal system. Roughly the first half of the film is devoted to exposing every aspect of Billy Hayes' orientation to his new environment. The audience is encouraged to sympathize with the English speaking hero who cannot understand a word that police, judges or guards are saying. The audience, like Hayes, is situated at the centre of the controversy, and unable to make literal sense of it is forced to interpret the proceedings from voice intonation and gesture alone.

Unfortunately the gripping control of these early scenes degenerates to an all-too-clear and brutal conveyance of Hayes' confinement. Voice intonation soon gives way to grunts and blood curdling screams for mercy and the gestures become an ugly manifestation of Turkish sadism. In the prison the feeling of alienation and solitude disappear as director Alan Parker treats the audience to juicy anecdotal tidbits relayed in rapid succession. Starting with Hayes first beating, the film continues to thrill with scenes like Hayes biting out another inmate's tongue and later with his exercise in masturbation as he gazes at his girlfriend's (Irene Miracle) breasts which she exposes during visiting hours.

Midnight Express makes use of stereotypes, the likes of which have not graced the cinema since the archtypal cowboy and Indian confrontation of good and evil in the early Westerns. All the WASP types are angels, goaded into action by their unreasonable oppressors. Every Turk is portrayed as a slimy bastard. They are so despicable that they become an obvious device, a simple target for the audience to channel its disgust. For the most part however, it merely draws attention to the heavily lopsided characterizations that the film depends on to convey its message. As a social commentary Midnight Express fails miserably. The racist delineation of the forces of good and evil completely subverts its "true story" base.

Bitter Grounds

Coming to Queen's Bittergrounds this Saturday and Sunday night is a show nobody should miss. Why? The Whilom Stringband, who have for six years crossed and re-crossed the country, playing the Community Hall in Errington, B.C., the National Arts Centre in Ottawa, and the School gym in Tuktoyaktuk, remain Canada's most talented folk band!

They've played in Vancouver, Halifax, Winnipeg, Saskatoon, Dawson City. They've performed for audiences of ten and for audiences of ten thousand, for prisoners and for Heads of State. Their albums, Canadian Sunset, National Melodies and Thanks to the Following, have sold nearly 30,000 copies thus far.

The group specializes in traditional folksongs and original compositions. Their leader Bob Bossin is a famed humourist. His original composition Maple Leaf Dog, commissioned by CBC for the television series Seeing for Ourselves, though never used by the corporation, is a wonderfully sly look at Canadian history. The history does get a bit distorted, but it's a beautiful distortion.

Whilom Stringband is a group which has long clung to its independence. The uncompromising Canadianism and their refusal to bow-to to the interests of foreign-owned record firms has resulted in their 3 albums being made and marketed by the band itself.

So take advantage of this opportunity to sit back and enjoy the music of the renowned Whilom Stringband at Bittergrounds.

Turkish prison as living Hell and Billy Hayes as false hero.

Student works at Toronto exhibition

Queen's students are participating in an exhibition of sculpture at the Royal Bank Tower in Toronto this week. The exhibition is part of the ARTVENTURE program established this year by the Royal Bank of Canada. It hopes to provide a professional program of exhibits to recognize and encourage Ontario's most talented student artists.

The directors and heads of more than 25 independent art schools and art programs in university and community colleges across Ontario recommended the best works of their students for inclusion in the exhibitions. Queen's Art professors Alan Dickson and David Pickering made the selection for the current exhibition.

The exhibition contains the works of five students presently with the Department of Art or recently graduated. They are P. Beesley, N. Dutrisac, F. Fitzpatrick, J. Rodger and D. Schrey.

The Department of Art is extremely pleased with the programme as they feel it gives students a chance to exhibit their work among their contemporaries in Toronto. Moreover, the students rarely get a chance to display their work in a professionally organized exhibit - an important aspect of art production.

There will be three prizes awarded at the end of the exhibition, chosen by professionals of their respective fields. It is hoped that the programme will be successful in this its first year and that further exhibitions will be made.

The Royal Bank of Canada and the students whose work is featured are to be congratulated for their efforts in this experimental program.

Eclipse: CANO
reviewed by Bruce Stratton

Eclipse must have been a very difficult album for CANO to make. Last January, the man who founded and led the Cooperation des Artistes du Nouvel - Ontario, Andre Palement, committed suicide. Eclipse, CANO's first work since this unfortunate event, is very much influenced by both Palement and his death.

The album is dedicated to "Dede". In addition to this, Eclipse contains one song written by Palement, as well as one which he wrote the lyrics for. The first song on the album, "Soleil Mon Chef," begins with Palement's voice telling us that "la journee commence mal, comme hier, comme avant-hier...comme demain" very chilling indeed.

This is not to say, however, that the album is at all morbid. To the contrary, CANO's music on Eclipse is as soaring and as joyous as ever. CANO seems to have the ability to create upbeat music even if it accompanies the most sombre of lyrics.

The cooperative spirit of CANO is quite evident on the Eclipse. The longest song on the album, "Bienvenue 1984," has no individual credit for the music itself. The song is an incredible mixture of musical styles. Rachel Palement sings of an Orwellian nightmare over a honky-tonk piano line which gives way to a guitar solo lifted straight from Nashville. Later, the same song shows a mechanical-electrical influence that could almost be compared to something Kraftwerk might produce.

It is the extreme diversity of the music found on Eclipse which gives rise to one of the album's shortcomings. The seven songs on the album range from "Moon Lament," which falls into the top-forty mold, to "Earthly Mother," an adaptation of a Ukrainian folk song. While this wide spectrum of music makes the album extremely interesting, Eclipse suffers from a lack of musical direction. We are offered bits and pieces which, although linked together, are not fully integrated with each other. As a result the album sounds quite choppy.

Despite this drawback, however, Eclipse is a fine album. CANO is still the best thing yet to emerge from Sudbury.

George Thorogood and the Destroyers
reviewed by Brent Laviolette

Blues and rock fusion bands have always bothered me because of their apparent inability to go either way totally. Nevertheless, some bands, such as Foghat, have been commercially successful with such a format. So successful, in fact, that many people have never been exposed to good, modern blues. They figure it's just about died off with all those old negro blues singers. Not quite. There's a white blues band who released their first album a few months ago and are attracting a lot of attention from old blues fans and rock and rollers alike.

George Thorogood and the [Deleware] Destroyers are pure blues through and through. Their music is raw, raspy, and overpoweringly "there". You can almost smell the beer drenched floor, stale cigarette smoke and putrid sweat of dancers as you put the album on. It's beautiful.

The production is appropriately amateurish and no attempt is made to cover the innumerable vocal and instrumental impurities; they're like flaws in genuine leather which give the piece its quality. Thorogood's voice sounds amazingly "white" despite his heavy dependance on traditional "negro blues" vocal lines, a welcome feature which many other white blues artists would do well to follow. His slide guitar playing is some of the greatest to be recorded in the last five years.

John Lee Hooker's "One Bourbon, One Scotch, One Beer" is rendered with incredible power and feeling, it really rocks on. "Kind Hearted Woman", a brilliant example of the slower Mississippi style blues, shows that Thorogood can handle his slide on an acoustic guitar with equal ease, and other tracks, such as "Deleware Slide", could raise the dead and get them movin'.

If you're looking for a new traditional, modern over-glossed, over-dubbed, over-produced pressing on fancy see-through vinyl, don't buy this album. If you're looking for real 50's and early 60's traditional blues, you can't miss this one.

Stage: David Bowie
reviewed by Kingsley Watts

Stage, a product of Bowie's 1978 tour, is most easily compared to "David Live", his earlier double album. Though similar in format, the albums share no material in common. In fact, the two albums are representative of entirely separate phases in Bowie's musical career. Whereas David Live included much of his early work, Stage draws on five recent albums, Station to Station, Young Americans, Heroes, Low, and Ziggy Stardust, of which the last two are duly represented with five songs apiece.

It is difficult to overlook the fact that many songs lack an expected intensity, notably "Heroes", "Hang on to Yourself", and "Star". Whether Bowie is providing new interpretations, or his sound technician forgot to turn up the mike volume is hard to tell. One gets the distinct impression that he is merely going through the motions in his renditions of the Ziggy Stardust songs. Aware of their popularity he sings them to please the audience while reserving his enthusiasm for his more experimental pieces.

Of particular interest is side three, consisting of predominantly instrumental tunes from Low "Warszawa"; a sobering though somewhat pretentious pseudo-symphonic work, is enjoyable. On "Speed of Life", one of the best songs on the album, and on "Art Decade" Bowie experiments with electronic music.

Overall it's an excellent introduction to the man who sold the world.

MASQUES

Masques: Brand X
reviewed by Chris Towe

Masques, Brand X's third studio album treads no new ground, that in itself is recommendation enough.

It represents a subtle synthesis of the progressive funk of Unorthodox Behaviour and the eastern tinged jazz/rock of Moroccan Roll. There is a consolidation of most of the finer licks and rhythms of the earlier albums in a way which is paradoxically unique.

The relatively conservative stance of the album may be explained by key personnel changes. The band's original drummer Phil Collins (of Genesis) says Brand X is a band geared to pubs and clubs and not the large concert circuit. I need it to offset the demands of touring with a successful band like Genesis.

However, with Brand X's growing popularity (the band has been selected with Roxy Music to tour mainland China) Collins departed to be replaced by Chuck Burgi on drums. Further-more, Robin Lumley who wrote many of the bands earlier compositions has been replaced by session ace Peter Robinson (who has played with such notables as Shawn Phillips), on keyboards.

Also, the album's clarity would give the Memorex test a run for its money.

Strong showing in Field Hockey

by Pearl Dixon and Brian Groos

Recently the Queen's Senior Field Hockey Gals travelled to York University for Part II of the O.W.I.A.A. Schedule. A great deal was to be decided at this final tournament before the National Competition. Toronto is hosting the Nationals; therefore, two Ontario teams gain the right to participate at this competition. In the Eastern Section Queen's was tied for second place. To ensure a second place position overall, the Gals had to win all four games this weekend.

Early Saturday morning the team met Waterloo. The game seemed to belong to Queen's as they managed to score first. Bev Koski put one by the Waterloo goalie in the first half. Unfortunately Waterloo rebounded with a goal shortly after. Despite Queen's control of the play and with a little help from the goal posts, the Gals could not put another one in the net. The game ended in a 1-1 tie.

The Gals' next game against Western helped to get them back on the road to the Nationals. Queen's dominated the play and did capitalize on their chances by Jan Hazelwood and Marie Miller, who might have had several more if Lady Luck had been with them. The Gals remained in the running as the games ended on Saturday. Their arch rivals, York, had also tied one game and won one game.

However, these hopes lasted but a night. Queen's met McMaster, again in an early morning contest. The game ended in a tie, when it should have been Queen's game all the way. The score was 0-0.

The finals game of the day saw Queen's vs. Guelph. The Gals were now in the position of spoilers. If they won, York would place second; if they lost Guelph would place second. Prior to the game Coach Senior team Captain Pearl Dixon reaches for a loose ball while Janine LaMarre prepares a backup.

Cuddy had some inspiring words for her team. For possibly six or seven of the girls, as well as Coach Cuddy, this was going to be the very last field hockey game to be played in a Queen's kilt. Many memories had been acquired over the last three, four and five years of playing together. After the tears were wiped from their faces and the lumps in their throats swallowed, the girls went to the pitch to play the best game of field hockey they had played all year. They defeated Guelph 1-0 on a well-deserved goal by Bev Koski. With this win they proved once again that Queen's is a team to be respected. Nanette Cuddy has done a great deal for field hockey at Queen's. She has brought the team to a level never previously attained by the field hockey Gals at Queen's.

Hopefully this level can be maintained in future years.

With only two veterans returning this year, the Intermediate's pre-season objective was a tall one - to bring up their standard of play to a level which would allow this year's Intermediates to easily replace the numerous Seniors graduating in 1979. On the basis of last weekend's performance, it is obvious that this objective has been surpassed. Their second place finish this year, behind Laurentian, is a highly credible ending for a team composed largely of first and second year students.

Lying in second place after one weekend of play, the Intermediates faced arch-rival Toronto in their first game last Saturday. Despite the poor field conditions, Queen's played what was possibly one of their best games of the season, continually carrying the play to Toronto. The forwards' offensive game netted two goals, by Sue Tsikwa and Louise Barry, before half-time. After an early second period lapse brought on a Toronto tally, the Intermediates' game pulled together to new heights of proficiency, leaving the Toronto team dead in its tracks. Particularly strong throughout the game was the half line consisting of Gillian Young, Cathy Mills, and Linda Murdoch, which adeptly switched the play across the field at every opportunity. Some intelligent defensive work (and the occasional offensive rush) by the fullbacks Cyncy Shantz and Heather Kennedy further added to Toronto's confusion. Final score: 2 to 1 for Queen's.

Trent was next, and Queen's improved on its performance of the morning, completely dominating the Trent team. While goalie Lori Livingston had a relatively quiet time, the forwards, using the speed of Chris Bowlby and Sue Tsikwa, continually buzzed around the Trent goal. Again, the Queen's defense and halfs showed their strength, with a strong game coming from Sue Gillespie. Queen's won 1 to 0 on a goal by Sue Tsikwa.

The next day Queen's was scheduled to meet the league-leading Laurentian, and the Intermediates had high hopes of pulling off another victory. With second place already sewn up by Queen's, and first place out of reach, the Gals still continued to press. While Laurentian won 1-0, this game was probably the hardest fought of all Intermediate league games this season. Again, Lori Livingston put in a sterling game in goal, while Lindee Stemp's knee continued to hold up long enough for her to put her play-making abilities to good use. But one of the most credible performances came from Janine Kneeling, who completely shook Laurentian's major individual offensive threat, while at the same time initiated many offensive drives herself.

This year had been termed a "rebuilding" year for Queen's Intermediates, but the team's second place finish surpassed many expectations. More important, if the calibre of play exhibited by the team during their last two weekends is any indication of things to come, the future of field hockey at Queen's looks bright.

Special thanks must go to Seiji Ohtake whose invaluable taping and advice kept everybody on the field, and also to Vicki Newbury, who made sure that everything ran smoothly at all tournaments and games this year.

Athletes Of The Week

After five weeks, this column is proud to present our first female "Athletes of the Week". The women's cross-country team captured the OWIAA title last weekend with strong performances from Anne Webster, Cathy Clarke and Susan Spence who finished 5th, 8th and 12th respectively.

Another outstanding performance was turned in by Carl Saunders of the Golden Gaels Soccer Team as he recorded his 5th shutout of the year in a 3-0 victory over RMC. Saunders consistent play all season has enabled the Gaels to become strong contenders for the CIAU title this year.

Heartbreaking second to U of T

X-Country bridesmaids again

by Adam Shoemaker

If frustration builds character, the Men's Intercollegiate Cross-Country team returned from the OUAA championships last weekend at

Brock with their characters built on firm foundations. The Gaels came close to capturing their first Little Cup, emblematic since 1910 of the team title at the OUAA finals, but despite a very solid team effort (which would ordinarily have assured them of a first place finish) they were narrowly defeated by the unexpectedly fine performance of the U of T runners.

Usually, if a squad places its best five runners (termed "counters") in the top 15 at a major competition, a team victory is assured. But last weekend Queen's did just that, yet still lost! The key to Toronto's 11 point victory, was the exceptional performance of its top four runners, three of whom were rookies, who surprised all observers with their superb races. As Queen's coach David Grant noted, "All our guys ran very well on Saturday, but Toronto was fortunate to have its top two rookies run the absolute races of their lives. On a given day, I feel sure that we could have defeated Toronto, but this just wasn't the day."

Certainly, as coach Grant observed, the Gaels need make no apologies for their performance. Team captain Adam Shoemaker encountered a few problems with the incredibly muddy 12,000 metre course, yet still managed a fourth place finish, despite late challenges from U of T runners. Veteran ace Claus Rinne put together what was definitely his finest effort of the season and ran a very gutsy race to finish in 11th spot. Mike DeGuda and Ian Gale demonstrated the Gaels depth, with 12th and 14th place finishes. Queen's last counter, Rob Livingston, finished right behind Gale in 15 position. Bob Graham and Jeff Bellinger also finished well, in 18th and 24th respectively.

There is no doubt that the team Queen's fielded last weekend was its strongest ever. Equally clear was the fact that the meet, though contested by nine universities, was essentially a Queen's versus Toronto battle. It is unfortunate that only one Ontario team can advance to the CIAU championships in Woodbridge

November fourth, since Queen's is most likely the number two intercollegiate cross-country team in Canada. After the OUAA meet, the CIAU final may prove to be somewhat of an anticlimax.

And so despite coming up short in the OUAA finals, the 1978 Cross-Country Gaels have nothing to be ashamed of. Not only did they register their finest OUAA performance in recent memory, but they can also look back on a season highlighted by numerous successes, including team championships at both the RMC and York Invitational meets. Nor is the season yet over for Adam Shoemaker and Rob Livingston, who are training for the upcoming Canadian Open finals, in Vancouver November 17th.

A large share of the credit for the metamorphosis in Cross-Country this year belongs to coach David Grant, a concerned and dedicated coach of close rapport with his athletes. Grant felt last weekend's loss just as keenly, if not more so, than his runners, but he knows also that just as it took 75 years for Queen's to win its first outdoor Track and Field title ever, the Cross-Country team's first OUAA title will be worth the wait as well.

Queen's argonauts collegiate powerhouse

by Nancy Woods

Not only is Queen's impressive on international waters but after only two years on the rowing scene they are now considered one of the strongest teams in the university circuit. Proof for this statement comes from the results of the Brock Invitational Regatta held last weekend in St. Catharines.

The varsity men won the unique Canadian event—the 500 metre sprint and then proceeded to win the 1500 metre event. The men's coxed four of Donald Grant, Rick Pearson, Dave Thom, Tim Wesley-James and John Gregg placed a very close second in their event and this is with a crew who had only rowed together for a week. The men's novice crew, coached by Tim Powell, held much enthusiasm in their 5th place finish.

The women also had impressive showings. The Varsity women who had problems at the start, managed to move from a last place position at the 500 metre mark to be narrowly beaten out of second by Trent. The women's coxed four held a commanding two boat lead throughout the race to handily win their event. Special mention should be made of the Women's Junior Varsity and Novice Crews who were rowing their first and last races of the season. The Junior Varsity crew who consisted of Jane Fontein, Jean Beck, Karen Russell, Sue MacKinnon, Sue Marshall, Rosemary Mueller, Carol Ellis, Julia McIlraith and Margot Medland showed impressive command of their race to come in first and the Novice crew of Sheila Hurley, Marg Thorpe, Diana Coulter, Marg Phillips, Janet Payne, Sue Carroll, Liz Wood, Nancy Esson, Kathy Ayon, Judith Fletcher and Trish Fleming placed second by only 3 strokes.

Queen's left the regatta with four wins, two seconds, one third and a fifth. With the finals this weekend there is a overwhelming feeling of confidence that Queen's will come home victorious.

Soccer Gaels in OUAA finals

by Benny

Two brilliantly struck penalty shots by Austin McGhie and a floating header by substitute Mike Font propounded the Queen's Golden Gaels into the OUAA Soccer final to be played on Saturday. Queen's, first place finishers in the league, simply out-hustled and out-desired the U of

T Blues to gain their spot in the championship match. "Everyone simply played their hearts out," commented Coach John Walker. "There was no denying us today; U of T wasn't even in it in the second half."

Keeper Carl Saunders came up with some breathtaking saves that helped settle Queen's down in the first ten minutes, and after that it wasn't even close. Andy Goodman, Wally Klus and Steve McKay ran miles from the striker's positions creating numerous scoring chances. Even after Goodman was taken off injured, the cohesiveness of the team was maintained by the fine play of Fontyn. So the Gaels are one step away from representing Ontario in the Canadian Championship. They will play the winner of the Laurentian-Waterloo game on Saturday at 2pm. Again, the game will be played at RMC to take advantage of the fine pitch.

Gaels close, but . . .

by Chris Cuthbert

If the Queen's Golden Gaels performance in last weekend's Dutch Cup hockey tournament is an accurate preview of what's to come this season then Gaels supporters are in for an exciting and promising winter of hockey.

The Golden Gaels dropped a heartbreaking 4-3 double overtime decision to St. Lawrence University in the tournament's championship game Sunday afternoon but their performance in the weekend competition was satisfying for sophomore coach Fred O'Donnell.

"It was a great game and the thing that impressed me most was the way the guys played fundamentally," stated O'Donnell.

In the championship game St. Lawrence and Queen's traded early first period power play markers as

SLU took a 2-1 lead into the first intermission when Randy Nielson drilled a shot through the pads of Queen's netminder Barry Ashley.

The second period was a classic demonstration of exciting, fast-paced hockey and superb goaltending. St. Lawrence's goalie Rick Wilson, a late amateur draft choice of the Montreal Canadiens, was a standout thwarting Kevin Treacy, Paul Stothart, Steve Watt and John Nightingale on excellent scoring opportunities. At 15:13 of the second frame the Gaels finally cashed in when Treacy connected on a nice feed from Stothart to tie the score.

Meanwhile, Ashby an O.U.A.A. all-star last season, stymied SLU's oftensive thrusts with a series of big saves. The Gaels' goalie was particularly impressive mid-way through the period while St. Lawrence was on the power play. As well Ashby preserved the tie through two periods with a glittering save off SLU's Jan Popeil in the closing minute of the period.

St. Lawrence recaptured the lead in the third period when Jamie Ross' seemingly harmless shot careened off defenceman Joe South into the Gaels' cage.

The Gaels, in pressing for the equalizer, produced some of the tournament's best action. The line of John MacIntyre, Ron Folk and Willie Wing generated most of the excitement and scoring opportunities but Folk's blast off the goal post was as close as that line came to scoring.

At 18:39 of the third period the Gaels drew even for the third time in the match when Ron Davidson unleashed a heavy shot which beat Wilson high on the glove side.

During the one and a half periods of extra time, the Gaels outperformed their rivals but a rare defensive error in the Queen's zone decided the issue for SLU. The Gaels lost possession of the puck in their zone while SLU's Jan Popeil was left unguarded in front of the Queen's goal. Popeil took a centering pass from Crawford and simply dumped it over a helpless Ashby to give St. Lawrence the tournament.

The Gaels future, however, looks promising with the emergence of Conway and South on the blueline and strong performances being produced by all four forward sets employed by coach O'Donnell.

Coach's Comments

by Tim Turnbull

After two heart-stopping victories, the Football Gaels will face yet another challenger to their championship drive when the powerful McGill Redmen come to town Saturday.

Coach Doug Hargreaves believes that the outcome of the game depends on the performance of the Gaels' offensive line. "Jim Rutka will be starting at quarterback after being out for four weeks. We can't let him get injured in the first quarter."

"Football is like any other game—all twelve men have to work together, particularly on the defensive line, otherwise the offense breaks down. A defence can cover up for an individual's mistake but an offensive play fails if one player makes an error.

"We've also let too many scoring chances slip away. We can't let that happen this week and hope to win. McGill has a balanced offence and an opportunistic defence (25 interceptions), so we have to make the most of any breaks.

Our defence has been outstanding the last couple of games.
